From graduating class to a corn cultivator and a pickle patch is the experience of a Walkerton, Ind., girl who is able to net $50 an acre from her work, and she is only fourteen years old. Lona Dare is the name this Hoosier lass, and she is named, for she ventures on things at which other girls would be amazed.

This year Lona Dare finished up the eighth grade in her school, came drivdiploma and graduating presents, only to make a quick transition. She was out of her tulle and into her gingham cultivating uniform in less time than it takes to write it, and, though one of the most studious and punctual girls of the class, she was appier for the change.

The father and mother of this girl agriculturist say that their child takes to such work from a natural inclination, from which they have been unable to attract her. She has shown a has been able to get near an animal of the kind, and now she is able to ride or drive any horse that may be
