TO MAKE HONEY FROM THE GRANULATED SUGAR,

-How to Test the Simon Eat Honey.

tor) :Re Mr. Bridge's letter, under date of December 26th, are you aware that large quantities of comb honey, sold in Kingston stores, are manufactured by bees from sugar? As a bee-keeper of ten years' experience (and I have made it a great study), I am afraid I will have to contradict Mr. Bridge's statement. In the first place it is an impossibility to feed bees on sugar syrup during the honey flow, they will not even look at Bees are always looking for the very best they can get. Mr. Bridge says the comb gives it a flavor. I would like to have Mr. Bridge tell where the comb gets its flavor. The comb is made from the same material the honey is made from, and it takes 16 pounds of honey to make one pound of comb, and you have to feed bees six pounds of sugar syrup to produce one pound of comb honey. The comb in a one-pound section weighs from one to two ounces, according to what kind of nectar they are gathering. With the bees gathering nectar from buckwheat the comb in one section will weigh about one ounce, basswood one and one-half ounces, clover ounces. I am not prepared to what it will weigh from sugar syrup. To feed bees granulated sugar for the purpose of making comb honey would be a poor investment, and you could detect it the instant you tasted it, for it would taste just like the sugar comb and honey the same. In the United States the store-keepers get the name of mixing glucose with retracted honey, but the honey so treated will not granulate. Nothing but pure honey granulates so the trade calls for granulated honey, then they

If Mr. Bridge had tried to get comb honey from his bees by feeding sugar he would not have dictated the article in the British Whig, under the name of "Adulterated Honey." If people would eat more honey they would live longer, look healthier, and be better natured. It is the only food that is already digested Lefore going into the Ki, C. B. Wood; S., C. T.
