Sentiment In Politics. A. E. Kemp, M.P., of Toronto,

Dr. Chase's Olat more he talks the less he says," at lended least of words that are impressive. At a meeting in Toronto, at which Col. Denison also spoke, and at which the defeat of the imperial conservatives was discussed, Mr. Kemp pointed out that Canada could get along without the preference which seemed to be imperilled.

The object of it, in his opinion, was to "bring the empire closer together" and strengthen its bonds,

A sort of sentimental arrangement So it would appear from the remarks of Mr. Kemp. Was that the air originally? What about the quid pro mo on which dear Sir Charles Tupper used to dilate so eloquently?

Was not Mr. Kemp's party some what annoyed at the preference offer ed by the Canadian government, and did not its leaders demand a business arrangement by which there would be no preference but a general exchange of trade on purely commercial lines

Building the empire and drawing its neinbers together! This is a new idena so far as Mr. Kemp and political friends are concerned. They were not quite so sentimental a while

Sensitive To Some Matters.

The people were warned by Mr Whitney very seriously, in 1901, that the Ross government was catering to the great corporations. Mr. Whitney saw an evidence of it in the which enabled the council to exempt the property of certain people from taxation for three years without the consent of the people.

The fact that the leader of a gov ernment desired to submit such legis lation," said Mr. Whitney, "is a startling intimation to the ratepayers of the province of the dangers that

Cost Of School Books.

The Whitney party, when in opposi tion, tired themselves and the people as they talked on the school book mestion. "A practical revolution is needed in the department of education," said Mr. Whitney at Charleston, in September, 1901, "and unless I am very much mistaken the appoint ment of a superintendent of education This sally, uttered in apparent sin

A commission had made a report, and Mr. Whitney would not believe it "When the proper time comes," said, "an exposure will be made the nature of some of the evidence that was given before that commis sion, evidence which I say was tinctly false, and intended to show that the cost of school books lower than the actual cost was.

Was that evidence ever sought? Was any real and honest attempt made to uncover the alleged wrong? No. Is it ot remarkable

"In my opinion the cost of school books," Mr. Whitney went on, raising his voice and becoming quite theatri cal, "can be materially lowered, and, if in no other way, that result can be attained by the publication of them by the government."

Strange that nothing further should be heard on this subject. Having succeeded to power, Mr. Whitney has forgotten about the school book ring and his pledge to smash it. What is the matter with him?

Mr. Whitney was, according to his own opinion, working and looking for 'a radical revolution." Mr. Ross' coninuation classes were, he thought, neant to supply the want which he discussed, but he took no stock in

Here are the things that should not have been neglected on any account, and not one word has been uttered with regard to them since the election of January 25th, 1905. What is the matter, Mr. Whitney?
