Petty Political Personation. It is premature to even infer what into the Webster-Bastedo case, but the evidence so far adduced indicates that the complainant had very little ground for his charge. It turns out that Webster was for merly a clerk in one of the depart ments at Ottawa, and that he uperannuated with an income $400 a year. The average man who

A Demand For The Hour.

The city has much need for some organization in which the business men can give expression to their thoughts on current events. The board of trade filled the bill in past years, and the Whig remembers the time when it was an institution of great influence and merit.

Perhaps it has outlived its usefulness. At any rate it is not giving any evidence of life, and perhaps it is better that something newer, with a change of plan, and with the guidance of our best business men, should take its place.

In other cities the organization of greatest helpfulness is the Citizens'
