Cure For Scours.

A new remedy is recommended as cure for scours among calves. It is no less than coffee-a pint to a quart, very strong, put in the calf's drink. The quantity is varied according to the age of the calf and the severity of the trouble. Of course the quantity of milk is reduced by the amount of cofadded. In one case beneficial rults were obtained by giving strong coffee to a cow. It is always well, however, to look for the cause scours, which must be found and removed. More can be done in this way than in giving medicine and remedies to keep the stock in good health. The best remedy in all cases of sickness is to remove the cause. Medicine may relieve for the time, but the trouble will return unless the cause of it is removed and measures taken to prevent its recurrence.

The Detroit and Cleveland Navigation company is having built a steamer whose cost is placed $1,250,000, which will be the monster of the lakes, and is to be ready for the season of 1907. This boat, as yet without name, is to be a side-wheeler somewhat akin to the New Providence, which was added to the Long Island Sound fleet last summer. There are to be passenger elevators, open fireplaces, and private telephones in every room, while private verandahs are to lead from the expansive parlors. Upon the decks of the steamer can be stowed 110 carloads of freight while her passenger excursion limit will be 4,500 persons. A married woman is apparently free to contract what debts she likes without disclosing the fact that she is an agent of her husband. When she is sued for payment of those debts she can plead that she is an agent, and she escapes all

The burden of ascertaining the facts rests with the tradesman, and he is, in legal theory at all events, supposed to put to his customers of the fair sex, whose names show that they are married, a series of embarrassing questions. He must ask them whether they are It is a traditionary etiquette custom | "principals" or "agents," and if he does goods at his peril. In these days of acute competition, such conduct on the would, it is to be feared, issue in the loss of custom and result in his bankruptcy. As the same results follows if he supplied the goods and found himself unable to obtain payment, he is impaled upon the horns of a dilemma. Nor must it be assumed for a moment that it is all plain sailing for the shopkeeper, even if he makes the most careful inquiry and is definitely informed that the lady is acting as a principal. It is a matter of common knowledge that settlements are the usual rule in the upper stations of life, and a married woman whose property is settled is again practically immune, and cannot be reached by her creditors. Thus the tradesman is once more in difficulties, and it is not very clear how assurances that the husband has given obtain without giving offence in some | Liberal politically. direction. When Mr. Chamberlain Broke Down, The only occasion on which Mr Chamberlain was ever known to betray emotion in the House of Commons was when an allusion was made to his son by Mr. Gladstone. It was in the very height and agony of the fight over the home rule bill. Young Mr. Chamberlain had made a speech, and to that speech Mr. Gladstone had to make an allusion. Nobody knew what was coming when Mr. Gladstone mentioned the name; and it is possible that Mr. Chamberlain may have imagined that the allusion would not be complimentary. Anyhow, what happened was that Mr. Gladstone said that the speech was one which a father might be proud to hear from the lips of his son. Mr. Chamberlain broke down promptly, visibly, without any power or effort at restraint. He drew his hand across his forehead and his eyes-evidently to hide unbidden tears. It was a curious instance of the man of iron revealing for a moment the softer side of his nature.

Looked the Same to Him. A well-known author, who was recently exploring a remote part of the east end of London, found himself beset by the pangs of hunger. Entering a small restaurant of somewhat doubtful aspect, he ordered a mutton chop. The waiter after a long delay returned bearing a plate on which reposed a dab of mashed potatoes and a much overdone chop of microscopic proportions and with a remarkably long and slender rib attached. Clapping this down briskly before the famished author, the waiter started off to attend to another customer without further ceremony. "I say," shouted the author, "I ordered a chop.

"Oh, beg pardon-that's true," returned the author, peering at it closely. Pearson's Weekly.

Vicar's Opportunity. A country clergyman who called on an influential neighbor, and being shown in by mistake, was amazed when twenty ladies came into the drawingroom from luncheon all in evening dress. They had come so dressed intending to play bridge all the afternoon dine without going home, and play on all the evening into the small hours.
