Projects by Which Clever Burglars

That the successful burglar is "born, not made," may be judged from the report of a case which recently came before the Berlin courts. The assistants of a large hairdresser's shop on arriving early one morning found placard on the shutters bearing the inscription "Closed on account of sud-den death." Thinking that the proprietor, Herr Jaskowiak, had died i ght, the assistants returned them went back to the shop. They then found, to their astonis says London Tit-Bits, their master seated at his desk making a list of goods stolen from his saloon. Knowing that the assistants arrived early the burglars, three in number, put up the placard in order that they might Somewhat similar, though even more daring, was the ruse of a clever gang of international thieves which, a few years ago, robbed a firm of London goldsmiths of goods worth £12,000. Aware that a watchman was not kept on the premises and that the principal and employees of the firm lived in outlying suburbs, the burglars waited until nine o'clock on an evening which was both wet and dark. The shop had then been closed about an hour, and the thieves carefully made up to resemble the men whose premises they were about to ransack, deliberately turned on a flood of light and affixed notices to the windows : "ureat stock taking sale ! Twenty per cent. off all marked prices. Goods sacrificed to make room for new season's stock !" Policemen on the beat, thinking they saw the proprietor and his assistants apparently hard at work checking their goods, suspected nothing, the burglars safely escaped with their booty to the continent.

A clever burglar ruse, careful study of the habits of the victim, was recently reported to the police. It is the custom of a business men who resides at Brixton and has his office in Queen Victoria street to leave home every morning and not rereceived an anonymous letter which informed her that her husband instead so you may come home looking as you rip apart, mark with a white though you had come out of the pro-thread as though basting where the lines of the plaits should be laid.
