tect them from the dew. All the bunches are gone over and carefully sorted, the good grapes being tossed into large, square, wooden troughs, where men, bare-legged, and wearing heavy shoes, with projecting on nails, tramp them out. Into an adjoining vat the liquid runs, while the residue of skins, stems and pips is put into another trough, and, after water is added, the mass is crushed with a wooden press. The oulp is used for fertilizer and to

The liquid obtained is run into butts and barrels, which are then stored away in cellars. Each barrel has a tin funnel inserted in the bunghole to permit circulation of air. In each barrel a vacuum taking the space of about four gallons of liquid, must be left in order to allow the wine to ferment without overflowing. After the fermenting period of about two months, the clear liquid is transferred to other barrels, earefully, so as not to disturb the sediment at the bottom. The barrels for the ultimate reception of the wine must be of white oak, perfectly clean and smoked with sulphur to prevent dampness. The barrels are then stored and care fully classified by experts and a name

Different kind of wines are obtained from the same grapes, grown in the same vineyard. Some of the wines are so bad that they are sold as vinegar or burned as alcohol.
