TWENTY-ONE WERE TAKEN

The Round-Up of the Italians at the Outer G. T. R. Station.

The Ringleaders Thought to Have Been Secured---Nine Were Chased to Cataraqui and Taken---The Mounted Artillerists Did Good Service ---Condition of the Wounded Men--- Police Court Proceedings.

To see actual warfare is an occasion granted not to many, and to those fortunate or perhaps better unfortunate enough to be at the outer station, Thursday afternoon, a miniature insight into the real thing was their reward. The facts of the riot at the lower depot have already been published,, so but a brief resume is necessary, and cause thereof, is perhaps best given in the words of the section foreman, in charge of the one hundred and forty-three Italians doing navvy work along the line of the railway.

Macoo informed the Whig that he had been with the Grand Trunk Railway as foreman of the gang for the past six years or so, and his story told in broken English was something like this:

"Yesterday morn I go to wake up men about 5.30 o'clock. They no get up, so I poke with a stick as I pass car. Pretty soon all get up and say no work. They want more monee. I tell them that no way to do, for them to go work and I write the general in Montreal, and mebee he give more monee, but can no get it this way. They no work, though, and make trouble all day."

Trouble, they certainly did create throughout the day. First came the fight among themselves, as a result of which, one of their number now lies dangerously wounded from knife thrusts. Later they started in to make things lively and the police were notified, but before leaving for the scene received word that everything was quiet again. Just after the noon hour a summons did reach the station however, which resulted in lots of trouble. The station agent called the guardians of the peace, because the "dago" lads were getting obnoxious about the platform. When they could not receive their increase in wages, they insisted on being paid off at once. "Me wantee monee," "Pay me our monee." No kind of argument could convince these sons of sunny Italy, that they must wait till they were taken back to Montreal, before they could get paid off, and they started in to get the worth of their money in other ways.

Knives And Revolvers.

On the arrival of Police Sergeant Nesbitt and Constables McAdoo and Naylon, the Italians were ordered back off the platform. They refused to go, and the growling foreign mob is left to imagination rather than description. The climax of this act in the tragedy came when Sergt. Nesbitt stepped forth to arrest the ringleaders. Knives and revolvers flashed forth, and the police and their reinforcements of Grand Trunk officials were forced to beat a hasty retreat. A street railway employee, in all the splendor of his uniform, for once regretted its immaculateness. He was taken for a police constable and had to run for dear life down through the gate, going so fast that he almost overtook "Charlie" Diamond's hack drawn by galloping horses and fleeing with the police before the mob. Of course, the "bobbies" put up a good scrap and many dagoes will remember the occasion for many days, but the police were utterly useless before such a horde.

Then attention was turned by the foreigners to men around the station, and many narrow escapes preceded by a spirited race, are on record. Probably the most thrilling of these happened to Macoo himself. Spotted by the men as the imaginary cause of all the trouble, he was chased down the platform, and sought shelter in the passengers' waiting room. The Italians began to break the glass windows and came in after him, so he was forced to fly further, and probably owes his life to William Harrison, the representative of the Canada Railway News company. That gentleman saw Macoo before the angry mob, and called for him to make for the restaurant. Once inside, Harrison slammed the door, and applied the bolts, but none too soon for the rioters broke through the stained glass windows and made vicious lunges at him with their long dirks as he jumped back into safety, having secured the door. Had any of the white men fallen into the hands of the foreigners at this stage of the excitement, their lives would have been worth very little and the many narrows escapes recorded are as many fatalities escaped.

Battery Called Out.

So closed the second chapter of the famous outbreak. The cause of the trouble, the arrival of the authorities, and their repulse have been spoken of. Now comes the white man's triumph, and the restoration of law and order. The men guilty of the murderous attack having done sufficient damage and being unable to find anyone on whom to vent their anger, retired to their cars to talk over their victory. But it was to be a short reprieve. The police in the meantime hurried to the city and reported to their superiors.

Mayor Mowat was at once communicated with and decided to call out the permanent military to help subdue the outbreak, and apprehend the ringleaders in the revolt. He deserves much credit for his prompt action in the matter, and to his energy is, no doubt, due the ultimate order which was soon restored. The members of "A" and "B" batteries, R. C. H. A., also displayed their military training in the manner in which they mustered on short notice, and the alacrity and judgment displayed throughout the afternoon.

The Whig's representative was early on the ground. When the smoke of the first skirmish had died away, the Italians retreated into their cars and remained there. The few employees at the outer station gradually came forth from behind the barricades, but none ventured across the tracks to the neighborhood of the rioters' stronghold. The scene around the station showed that a conflict had been raging a short time previous. Broken glass galore, broken doors, broken everything—a scene of destruction. Word had been passed around that the soldiers would soon be there and many expectant glances were cast over the hillside.

"They're coming!" somebody cried and a faint cheer echoed from the gathered group. Sure enough the artillerymen were on their way. All mounted and armed with carbines, the khaki clad veterans of South Africa soon galloped through the railway yard gate and formed in the square at the rear of the depot. They then dismounted and leaving their horses in charge advanced with martial tread and arms at the shoulder towards the dago encampment, headed by Maj. Leslie, and Capt and Adjt. A. Z. Palmer. Between the officers marched Mayor Mowat, who had already arrived on the scene, and was prepared in case necessity arose, to read the riot act. It looked for all the world like the imaginary picture one has often drawn of the capture of a small railway station during the late South African war or of one of the many sketches presented in the illustrated London papers describing that war.

Taking Of Prisoners.

Quickly Maj. Leslie distributed his men. The cars were surrounded and not a man allowed to move under penalty of being shot down. Then the experience of the veldt came into use. Detachments were told off to scour the country around for missing fugitives, and it was just the kind of fun Tommy Atkins was looking for. Over the slope and through the long grass, the regulars scouted, rounding up their men in groups. In most instances the Italians came in peacefully, but when opposition was shown a look down the barrel of a loaded carbine satisfied them as to the best policy to be pursued.

The first party to make a capture was composed of Q. M. S. McCully, Sergt.-Maj. Peppiatt, Corpl. Macdonald and Gr. Lalonde. They brought in three prisoners whom they discovered hiding in the tall grass. After that the captives were brought in by twos, threes and fours until late in the evening. Great difficulty was experienced, however, in identifying the ring-leaders of the riot as in the prevailing excitement all the dagos looked much alike.

When the majority had thus been coralled a form of roll call ensued, and it was discovered that many of the foreigners were still missing, having made good their escape between the time of the riot and the arrival of the soldiers. Mounted parties were sent out along the different highways with orders to arrest any of the gang found, and hand cars were called into service that the vicinity of the railway tracks on either side of the station might be scoured. While further developments were being awaited a thorough search of the ballast train was made by Chief of Police Baillie and his men, but nothing of particular moment found.

Abode Of The Dago.

A brief description of the abode of the macaroni man might be interesting. He makes his home in a number of unused freight cars, each of which accommodates about ten men. The ground outside was decidedly dirty and unsanitary when viewed by the writer. Old clothing, particles of food, rice, sugar, beans, etc., galore were scattered on the ground as well as quantities of bedding, straw, broken bottles and so forth. Just in front of the dingy ladder, which gave access to each car, was a fire place dug in the ground after the true gypsy style. Inside the car a like typical scene greeted the eye. Directly in the centre in most instances, was a box car of some date and description, while throughout were scattered little wooden benches, just large enough to accommodate one man. The bunks occupied each end of the car and were most rudely constructed. Mattresses were a luxury and when they did exist simply were constituted of bags stuffed with hay or grass. For springs a piece of coarse wire fencing seemed in most favor. Hanging about the sides of the car were an odd frying pan and a few cups, etc., all representing a most primitive mode of life. Occasionally an accordion was to be seen, which, no doubt, represented the pleasure of many an evening spent round the camp fire. The whole thing presented a view of living most repulsive to the eyes of an ordinary civilized being.

Soon followed a general round-up. The prisoners were marched in under escort. The cars were emptied and the cause of all the trouble, in the person of about 100 Italians, was lined up in two rows, for inspection. Here many amusing incidents were recorded and the soldiers once more demonstrated a trick or two learned during the Boer war. Nothing in the form of shooting irons were found, but razors, ugly knives, peculiar to the race abounded. These were kept by the police. The knives are ugly looking weapons and in the hands of treacherous men, present a dangerous front. They are about the size of a razor and the handle is shaped like a new moon. Into this fits the blade which is drawn to a fine point, keenly sharpened throughout its length and widening as the hilt is approached. The search completed, the prisoners not already conveyed to the station were marched in under the care of a mounted escort and the police. The bugle sounded and the soldier boys once more formed up, secured their horses, and rode back to town. Thus ended the first part of the episode. The concluding scenes will be enacted before the cadi.

The Police Have Nerve.

Kingston's police cannot be accused of lack of nerve. The attack of three of them on over 100 Italians shows that they are right up to the nerve mark. On future occasions, however, they should carry revolvers, when on any similar mission, so that the odds will not be so great. A half dozen revolvers in the hands of the police would have cowed the dagoes. Police Sergt. Nesbitt displayed his old-time grit and dash in making a rush for the ringleader. When he grabbed the latter, one of the dagoes, with that treachery for which the lower class of Italy is celebrated, stabbed him from the side. Sergt. Nesbitt also received a knife wound high up on the left breast. There is a tiny bruise on his left leg, which looks as though a bullet had glanced off it. The sergeant is at his home and resting easy.

Chief Detective McRae, of the G.T.R., was pinioned by a dago, who seized him from behind and planted his pointed steel in the abdomen on the left side. Mr. McRae is in the general hospital, progressing as well as could be expected. The doctors would not say this morning what the result might be.

When Sergt. Nesbitt was attacked, his two assistants, Constables Naylon and McAdoo whirled their clubs. Constable Naylon made a swipe at a dago, but another of the rioters grabbed the policeman's arm. Then Constable McAdoo brought his club down on the "cocoanut" of the greasy dago, knocking him down and out. The two detectives did their share of clubbing, but all had to retreat. To have done anything else would have been foolhardy.

At the Police Station.

In all, twenty-one Italians were rounded up; placed under arrest and spent Thursday night in the several cells at the police station.

The first arrest was that of Vincenzo Delalla, a tall, rather better looking specimen of the dago, than his companions. He was fairly well dressed, but had nothing in his possession, when searched. He was looked upon as the ringleader of the rioting gang. A three-cornered cut, over his left eye is good proof that he took an active part in the fighting and

BREAK DOWN

Is Feared In The Case Of Harry Thaw.

CALLED TO PLEAD

AND HE TOOK THE MATTER VERY DEEPLY.

Mrs. Thaw to Save the Life of Her Husband Will Go on the Stand and Tell All—The Lawyers Will Not Permit Thaw to Have His Way.

MRS. HARRY THAW.

New York, June 29.—Harry Thaw, as he prepared to leave his cell, in the Tombs, to plead to the indictment of murder in the court of general sessions, across the Bridge of Sighs, showed plainly that he was on the verge of a complete break-down.

Evelyn Nesbitt Thaw, to save the life of her husband, will go on the witness stand and tell all. Emotional insanity will be the defence offered by Thaw's lawyers. Thaw indignantly resents any suggestion that he was insane when he killed White, but his lawyers will not permit him to have his own way.

Thaw, entered a formal plea of "not guilty," when arraigned. The plea was entered with a reservatiob that it may be withdrawn on Tuesday night.

GERMAN ADMINISTRATION

In South-West Africa, Condemned.

Berlin, June 29.—The charges that have been repeatedly brought against the German administration, in South Africa, have been crystallized during the last few years, under an organized attack by the Catholic party in the reichstag, headed by Hon. Freberger, Hon. Freberger declares a large proportion of the gifts and money collected for the soldiers at the front have not reached their destination, but have been shared among officials in Berlin, also that new rifles, uniforms and kits, sent to South West Africa, are being privately sold to farmers in Argentina.

Hon. Freberger draws a picture of general demoralization, saying that spirit-drinking is everywhere prevalent; that courtesans of all nationalities are flourishing, and that the prisons are full of whites. Similar charges are directed against the administration of the Cameroons.
