Another new leature of the law is Clause 4, which makes it unlawful for any one to "require any employee in telebraph, telephone, or transportation lines, or in connection with industrial processes, to do the usual work of his conditions. It is highly probable that such a law could not have been passed had it been other than a government would or could have successfully carried it through parliament in the public press. Some have and the act is dead, others that it is useless, on the one hand; and on the other, there are those who consider it the best Lord's Day act on the statute books of any those who consider it the best Lord's Day act on the statute books of any country; others that it is in many particulars over stringent. The truth lies between the two extremes. We have not secured all we sought. The act has been weakened in certain particulars, but on the whole it is a good act. It is an immense gain over what we had before. It covers the points that were left uncoveted in our old provincial acts which still remain in force. It is much more sweeping than perhaps many people recognize. In the first place, it is an immense advantage that we have a Lord's Day act for the whole dominion which recognizes the Lord's day as a national in institution, the toiler's day of rest and liherty, the church's day of glorious opportunity. This in itself is a limitation of the law in the closing days into the law in the closing days of the session certain features to the law in the closing days of the session certain features of which we cannot speak so highly. One of these is the insertion in clauses, the close in the insertion in clauses, and there were murdered in their home, one mile cast of Barber's Junction, one mile cast
