GOOD NORTH KING

AND THE WAY THE CAPTAIN HANDLES HIS CRAFT. He Rules Her as Easily as a Well Broken Horse—A Delightful Trip Down the Bay to Kingston.

"Passengers not allowed on this deck." Now who but would feel that life outside of that deck would be an aching void a hollow farce, a thing devoid of joy, a blank? Especially when the deck was the King's and "she" was sailing down the Bay of Quinte, its shores dressed in green as fresh as June? So—"May we go forward?" we said to the captain, his cheery, "Getting the fresh air?" as he passed us back near the Angelus and no cab appeared, though we had been up and dressed and eaten almost all the breakfast that our family, if not nature, required of us, we felt that they would not blow for us. And again there would be the excuse to be made to trusting friends in Kingston when we failed to appear—"we got left." We felt it wouldn't sound well when you've told a story twice it goes, but when you come along with it a third time, and don't see that you can vary it, you feel it will sound fishy. "It all comes," we said, "of not telling—John Smith, we'll call him, though that's not his name—to call for us. We said we'd never trust to anybody else again, and we have, and here we are." And there we were hanging our heads out the window, watching the moments fly. "You can telephone and explain," suggested some one. But it didn't sound alluring. We felt that it would have been too much to expect to be on schedule time as we promised. Ah! it was a swift thought, and we ran down and out to the corner. "Would you please telephone up town and ask why our other hands?" we were asked. We were too agitated by hope to be coherent ourselves and besides the masculine voice has a peremptoryness, if not he, which demands obedience. The answer was a thundering of hoofs down the steep hill, and a pair of the horses which Prince Edward breeds, galloped up. "Hurry now," he snorted. The eighty boys leaped forward upon the deck, and a race along the level, round the corners with a whoop—who cared! and down the hill they charged again, surefooted, till they dashed upon the dock. "Ladies first, the men next," remarked a fellow-passenger politely, as we stepped down after our post-chaise and the vessel opened up. We felt "John Smith" had leaped against the storehouse door watching us, was saying, reproachfully, "Now, if you'd told me this would never have happened." So we did not obtrusively onto the Jessie Bain and sailed out to meet Royalty. We met her just up the Long Reach, steaming down the bay, and proud she looked in the morning sun, with a gleam of a new dollar. She is very quick and span—but everybody knows this. We quit as slowly and shifted to her quickly. The captain handed us his big craft as easily as you'd turn a well-adjusted door knob.

On board and away, and who could ask for more than a seat on the bow of her hurricane deck, with a deck from her master or mate thrown in? Not we. And here's thanks for that seat and that word, and the chance of a trip to his rendezvous so perfectly a happy holiday.

STOLE MONEY. "Friend" Alleged to Have Stolen Twenty Dollars. A young man from near Napanee was at the police station this afternoon, complaining that he was robbed of twenty dollars, in two ten dollar bills.

He says he came from Rochester, N.Y., where he has been working, and on arriving in the city, having a few hours to spend before going to his home, decided to look up some friends. He met a man he knew and they walked around town. He had a lot of small silver so he had it changed into a ten dollar bill. He put the money with a bill of similar denomination in his watch pocket. His "friend" asked him to his home for dinner and he went.

"How'd you trade watches," the friend is alleged to have asked, the complainant, at the same time quickly taking the watch out of his pocket. A few moments later the money was missed.
