THE LONDON POLICE MAN'S PAY AND DUTY

Tourists having occasion to enlist the services of London "constables," if only to ensure the way to some point of interest, find them as a rule intelligent and well posted. This is because only men of intelligence and good character are appointed. They get upon the rolls after passing a rigid civil service examination and producing incontrovertible certificates of character.

Once appointed, the constable—as the London patrolman is called—is not dependent upon political favor. If he does his duty he is sure of his position and a pension upon retirement. The discipline of the force is severe; to take money from a liquor dealer, even for a legitimate service, means instant dismissal.

Most of the London police are walking guide books to points of interest. They know the history of the city and the location of its famous places; they can direct one to the residence of a living celebrity or to a quaint nook immortalized by Dickens. And yet these men are woefully underpaid. Upon joining the force, the recruit must be content with a salary of £330 a year, and it is only after a considerable term of service that he receives his maximum wage of £405.

A New York roundsman gets $1,500; a sergeant, $2,000; a captain, $2,750; and the chief inspector, $5,000. Upon the London force a sergeant, corresponding with a roundsman, gets £700; an inspector, corresponding with the New York sergeant, $1,700.

Superintendents, corresponding with captains on this side of the water, get $2,100, and the chief constable, or head of the force receives $4,000. The difference between the pay of officers in the ranks on opposite sides of the ocean

It costs London taxpayers $9,331,145 a year to maintain the police force, of which amount $7,251,065 is paid for salaries.

On December 31st, 1904—the latest date to which published statistics have been brought—the strength of London's police force was thirty-one superintendents, 539 inspectors, 2,148 sergeants, and 14,129 constables, or patrolmen.

Five superintendents, 152 inspectors, 228 sergeants and 1,627 constables were employed on special duties in connection with various government departments. The remainder of the force looked after public welfare in the usual manner.

Each member of the force is granted one day off duty each fortnight, so that one-fourteenth of the entire force is constantly on leave. Of course a number of men are always away on sick leave in addition, the average number being 471 a day.

The men of the force work eight hours a day. They guard the greatest city in the world. The district to be protected extends over a radius of fifteen miles from Charing Cross, and includes 609-1/2 square miles.

This area is exclusive of the old section shown in the city of London proper, which consists of one square mile in the heart of the great gathering of humanity. It has a population of 30,597, and under the lord mayor has its own separate and complete city government and its own police.

All the remainder of the metropolis is comprised of twenty or more separate cities, each with its own mayor, representative councils and other municipal officials, but all together constituting that part commonly known as London.

These different municipal communities, however, have no control over the police that guard their streets. The Metropolitan force, as it is called, is directed by the national government through the office of the home secretary.

It is a thoroughly efficient and honest force. There are no police scandals. Drunkenness is punished by dismissal. Stringent rules regulate financial dealings between policemen and the public, so that "Bobby" promptly pays his debts.

Not only is he prohibited from taking money from a saloonkeeper, but he cannot borrow from the keeper of a public house.

Visitors to London have noticed that most policemen accept tips. If you ask him how best to proceed to some point of interest and reward him courteously given information with a shilling, he will touch his helmet and thank you. Willingness to accept tips is scarcely surprising in men who may be compelled to support families on $160 a year.

For more important service rendered voluntarily or in the discharge of duty there is a class of rewards, but the general practice in the force is to report to headquarters; such rewards as have been given and secure permission to retain them.

A constable, or patrolman, instrumental in saving life in a street accident, is expected to report the reward, if one is given. As a general thing, the policeman is allowed to keep the reward; but he cannot receive anything from people in the community which he is employed to watch. In such cases he is supposed to be doing only his plain and paid duty.

Good sense and toleration mark the conduct of the London policeman. These conservators of law and order are seen at their best in the management of holiday crowds, when there are jubilee processions or brilliant town shows and when unnecessary harshness or insolent orders might incite riots.

"The policemen do nothing" to irritate a crowd that is disposed to be good natured. They look on and seldom give orders, when they do it is done courteously and quietly. The police know the temper of a London crowd and seldom get out of harmony with it.

The proportion of felonies to each 1,000 of the population was 2.443. The value of property stolen decreased in 1904 over $19,900 from the figure of the previous year.

A considerable sum, in the aggregate, was saved the public in the way of recovery of lost property, found in public conveyances. 52,131 articles were taken to headquarters to await claimants.

The number of fatal accidents in the streets of London has decreased of recent years, notwithstanding the increase of population and in the number of visitors, both from the English provinces and from foreign countries. During 1904 the number of policemen injured while in the discharge of their duties reached 3,054. Of these, 349 were out of service longer than a week.

For its size, London is remarkably free from serious crime. There are pickpockets—students of the Fagan type—and sneak thieves in plenty; but the habit of meeting out swift justice discourages greater crime.

During 1901 there were reported, from a population of over 6,000,000 people, only twenty-four murders. Sixteen of these murderers were tried and nearly all convicted. Six accused persons committed suicide, one escaped and the other, a woman, was not prosecuted, owing to the peculiar conditions of the case.

In 1904, there were twenty murders reported. Twelve of these were arrested and eleven convicted. Altogether there were 20,372 charges of serious crime brought to the attention of the authorities. Of these, 14,911 persons were arrested, and 10,350 were convicted.

Presenting this record to the public the members of London police force think they should be better paid for their services.

The Cry of Bad Blood.

Let the blood become impure or impoverished and the nerves which draw their nutriment from the blood are apt to reply with pain.
