servant Man On the Frst Snow. When nature turns the first white page of winter for the record of her infinite activities her children are alert and ready to inscribe the varied stories of their personal exploits and meanderings. Where the new snow the curve of a hurrying stream a muskrat began the inscription with-out waiting for the guiding illumination of day. His babylike feet have hold. Men are now applying the scientific documents. The day has come and between these runs the groove of lenger en'orce their decrees upon any his snakelike tail. The new snow pre-serves the record of his early excur-day no jurisdiction over any body of sion, even to the crystal drops that men except the second order of the fell from his close fur as he left the priesthood. The people can never be water. He walked along the bank sure that what the clergyman says is away from the stream for a short disnewly whitened landscape, made a what he thinks he ought to say. He few distinct impressions in the snow is concealing his own best thought, with his fore feet as if curious about the new covering the world had put thought may bring him into trouble. on, and then returned by a longer That is the condition that threatens where he had emerged. There is dignity and deliberation in the trail of the muskrat, writes Mr. S. T. Woods, Beyond the high bank is a record so small and faint as to indicate helpless weakness, almost lost in the broad white expanse. A field mouse with short, hasty steps made his laborious way for a few feet over the snow and disappeared under a small drift that concealed his further ourse. How big and impassable the world must have seemed to him when he floundered more than his depth in the little groove, while his tiny feet shallow snow! In winter he may commit serious depredations by gird ling fruit and other trees under the nelpless on the new page that he is almost forgiven in advance. A vagrant cat has been abroad, and her round paws have melted their regular impressions deeply and distinctly into the snow. This track moves along in a sheltering furrow and soon shows the record of a stealthy crouch before a spring. A few feet away some slaty grey feathers complete the story. Jun-coes have been hopping all about the place, and the long springing strides of the swift rush lead to where one has been captured by the stalking enemy. The feathers are fragments of a leaping red squirrel has a much more cheerful aspect. He bounded along not in haste, but in joy, his broadly separated hind feet overreaching the close twin marks of his fore feet at every spring. From one large tree to another he makes his way, seeming to inspect each and hurry along. At the foot of a black oak the trail ends, showing that the happy squirrel chose a more athletic path among the branches. In the closer woods the tracks of & dog are scattered about with an irregularity suggesting human influences. Turning, doubling, crossing, and recrossing, his tracks lead about in bewildering uncertainty. The cause of all the excitement is disclosed by the clear, quadruple track of a cottontail beside a small viburnum bush. The long leaps that threw the dog off the scent make this trail difficult to follow. Cottontail was evidently in a hurry, judging by his long irregular bounds, but his separated hind feet point his direction. Where the shrubbery is more open the dog finds his trail again, and both lead away toward the dark green cedars. Near a broken field a crow has stalked thoughtfully, etching his bold records along the white expanse. The scales of a pine cone scattered by a squirrel
