A MAN OF PRIVILEGE

LONDON'S LORD MAYOR A PERSONAGE OF POM AND POWER.

The First Holder of the High and Mighty Office Was Elected in 1189 and Proved Popular—Dick Whittington and Other Ancient Worthies—How Self-Made Lord Mayor Gave Charles II. a Taste of His Quality.

The most impressive thing about the mayoralty of London is its great antiquity. In Saxon and Norman times London was an independent state, and the chief magistrate—the portreeve, or bailiff—was an absolute ruler.

Through the long intervening years the lord mayor has retained many of his prerogatives as a ruler. Most people have no idea how extensive his prerogatives are.

He has his own chaplain (in olden days, like the monarch, he had his jester, fool, and badges of royalty are attached to his office—the scepter, the sword of justice and mercy and the mace. He has right of precedence in the city before all the royal family.

The majesty of his state is pretty considerable too. The city gives him a sum of £10,000 to expend. His palace, the Mansion House, is furnished with plate and ornaments worth £100,000. He has a splendid retinue of about 150 attendants.

Another feature which makes the lord mayor's office attractive is its glamour of romance. More often than not the king of the city is a scoundrel who, as an apprentice, as many other lord mayors have done. The mayor of 1611 came to London in rags in a carrier's cart.

The tenacity of this mayor seems almost incredible. He refused to give up his office until he had secured a loan on his security of £50,000 on the pretext of a trifling city riot and £50,000 for pretended mismanagement of estates.

The mayors, themselves, however, could find readily enough on occasion. For example, his worship of the year 1479 had one of his sheriffs fined £50 (about £1,000 of our money) for kneeling too close to him while at prayers in St. Paul's.

Yet another lord mayor (1839) made an amusing blunder of speech at a dinner to judges and leaders of the Bar. "See before you," he exclaimed magniloquently, "the examples of myself, the chief magistrate of this great empire, and the chief justice of England sitting at my right hand, both now in the highest offices of the state and both sprung from the very dregs of the people!"

These mayoral banquets, by the way, have always been wonderful affairs. In the year of George III.'s marriage there were placed on the table 414 different dishes, excluding dessert. Forty-five years later (1806) no fewer than seven of the monarch's sons were guests at a mayoral dinner.

All this, however, is hardly romance. We must revert to Sir Richard Whittington for that. Sir Richard really did hear the bells of Boro telling him to "turn again," and he did marry his wealthy master's daughter, and he did become three lord mayors of London. But, alas, he had no cat!

PLENTY OF CHALK.

A Block That Was Once as Large as the Continent of Europe.

The small piece of chalk which is in constant use in the schoolroom, the lecture room, the billiard room, and the workshop, has a strange history, the unravelling of which through all its complexities is one of the most difficult problems with which the science of the present day is called upon to deal.

In the British Isles the chalk is found in greatest quantities and in continuity in the east and southeast of England. A sheet of chalk more than a thousand feet in thickness underlies all that portion of England which is situated to the east and southeast of the North Sea at Flamborough Head to the coast on the English Channel in Dorset.

Best of all, he has the power to raise vast sums of money for charitable purposes. In the last quarter of a century the lord mayors of London have raised nearly £6,000,000 for the relief of various people in distress.

Another fellow-made lord mayor gave Charles II. a taste of his quality. Charles dined with him in the city, and the wine passed so freely that the guests grew noisy and the mayor's family. Charles therefore stole away from his coach in Guildhall yard, but the bibulous mayor pursued his majesty and, catching him by the hand, cried out, with a monstrous oath, "Sir, you shall stay and talk to'other bottle!"

The tenacity of this mayor seems almost incredible. He refused to give up his office until he had secured a loan on his security of £50,000 on the pretext of a trifling city riot and £50,000 for pretended mismanagement of estates.

SOMEbody.

Somebody's counting Somebody

Near the bright river's flow, Running so still and slow, Talking so soft and low, She sits with Somebody.

No one sits up to wait, Though she is out so late, All know she's at the gate Talking with Somebody.

Two, sitting side by side, Float with the ebbing tide, Through life," says Somebody, "Somewhere Somebody Makes love to Somebody Tonight."

"Nothing is Ever Settled Until It is Settled Right."

"From Carlyle's 'Past and Present': 'Parliament records, fixed forms and poor terrestrial justice, with or without horsehair—what same man will not reverence these? And yet, behold, the man is not sane, but insane, who considers these things as venerable, and the policy holders have for security the unlimited liability of all the stockholders of the city giving new business get rates from Strangé & Strangé, Agents.'
