CONSULT THE PEOPLE:

the Referendum to Hold Lords in Check. J. A. Hobson has an opportune article in this month's Independent Review on the House of Lords. After dwelling on the "humorous effrontery and monstrous inconsistency' with which the apologists for the peers defend the destruction of the education bill. Mr. Hobson plends for "a just and reasonable application of the democratic doctrine of the mandate as the best method of removing the obstruction of the House of Lords." Mr. Hobson's suggestion is that the government should introduce a bill empowering the House of Commons, in case a measure passed by them is either rejected or grievously amended originally sent up to the House of Lords, or as subsequently re-amended to a popular referendum, with the provision that when a majority these voting approve the measure it should forthwith be submitted to the
