SIR PERCY GIROUARD.

Character Sketch of the New High Commissioner of Northern Nigeria

by J. Saxon Mills. I was greatly interested to read that Sir Percy Girouard had been appointed high commissioner of Northern Nigeria, in succession to Sir Frederick Lugard, writes J. Saxon Mills. Of none of my friends in South Africa have I a livelier and more pleasant recollection than of this distinguished officer of engineers. I had gone once more to Johannesburg, just after the conclusion of peace. The inverse had been perhaps a little journey had been perhaps a little more pleasant than during the war time, but still very far from luxurious. Sir Percy Girouard's invitation, therefore, to return to Cape Town with was extremely welcome. Sharing Sir Percy's hospitality were two other officers of the engineers, a Canadian and an Englishman, and elsewhere in the train there were two officers of the Cameron Highlanders, who had a standing invitation to meals in the saloon. As we were simply hooked it, and as the train ran for long distances without stopping, it was somewhat difficult to arrange mealtimes with our Highland friends A Contrast. The contrast between this species of traveling and what I had endured over thousands of miles during the war was indeed poignant. We actually had little paper table napkins, and, what is even more surprising, a written menu. The sleeping accommodaour supplies proved sufficient for the extensive demands made on them. I have the most delightful remembrance of the long, warm afternoons through which we sat smoking cigars in uninterrupted succession, and looking out to the far horizons of veldt and karoo. My ocmpanions had been through the entire campaign, and endless and excellent were the stories they had to tell. I remember particularly hearing about the enginedriver whose train was attacked, I think, near Middelburg. The stoker fell mortally wounded at his side while the driver himself was shot through both arms and cheek. He stuck to his post, however, and chiefly by means of his teeth and head brought the engine for four or five miles safely into the station. This was only one of many such incidents of the heroism of engine-drivers during the war. Sir Percy Girouard tried to get the Victoria Cross for this man, but a medal was the only reward he received. One of my traveling friends had been in command of an armored train, and had many interesting experiences to relate. I have often been very thankful for the presence and support of these evil-looking appliances, but it was apparently no joke to have to live in an armored train. Nothing could be less cosy. Major Nanton dwelt particularly on the sufferings from cold in the high veldt.

He and his men, he said, had often been as deadly and actually sick from the cold as if they had been in a heavy storm at sea. They were unable to find any cure for this singular effect of life in an armored train. Characteristics. Col. Girouard was himself the best of all companions. He looked, and I have no doubt still looks, very boyish for a man who has done so much work and won so much distinction. Breezy and boisterous, big-hearted and bigmonthed, with single eye-glass and cigar as his inseparable attributes, every line of his face, every tone of his voice and every gesture tells of energy and decision of character. Col. Girouard is a Canadian and a Roman Catholic, and he seems to harbor a permanent suspicion that somebody intends to deprive him of his nationality and his religion. The emphasis of his language was a source of endless amusement to me, especially as it was often blended with expressions of sincere religious feeling. To argue not necessarily with force of argument but with sheer over-bearing, yet always good-natured, strength of will and conviction, expressed with flashing eye, thundering fist, scowl of brow and the shout of a splendid resonant voice. Major Nanton, I remember, was anti-American in spirit, while Girouard was inclined to the wider Anglo-Saxon patriotism. The major alluded to the anti-British feeling in America. "Yes," replied Girouard 'among your Irish-Americans, but"with rising voice—"what are your Irish-Americans? Muck," he shouted And a mere argumentative reply was impossible. But, in spite of this Anglo-Saxon sentiment, Sir Percy Girou-ard is intensely devoted to his French Canada. "Don't you interfere with us," he would say, "you English think that everybody who is not English is Long, long talks we had in those quiet African afternoons, as we slid down the single slender line to far-off Cape Town and the sea. Girouard was at that time head of the Imperial military railways and he had made his personality felt over the whole system. I was especially struck by his attention to detail. Once he caught sight of an old tarpaulin, in-scribed with the betraying letters "I. M. R., which a Kaffir had commandeered for the roof of his private residence. There was a little row, I remember, about that. But on the whole our journey was tranquil and uneventful. The worst mischance was that at Magersfontein the cigars almost gave out, as well they might. I will claim the credit of having pretended that I was sick to death of cigars, in order to save my host the unendurable agony of a famine in this particular. I have never seen Col. Girouard since we parted on the station at Cape Town. I have met a good many men in different walks of life, but never a more happy and healthy and heart-sound personality Since those days he has married the daughter of Sir Richard Solomon, who has just resigned the position of Attorney-General of the Transvaal, and he is now the happy father of a son and heir. Britons may be well assured that Northern Nigeria, at least, will be a well-governed province of
