BROADBRIM'S

Letter From Greater New York.

YOUNG CRIMINALS

PROVE TO BE BOYS WELL EDUCATED.

The Good Work of Anthony Comstock—Broadbrim Deals With Grand Opera and Tells of Happy Days of His Youth.

Special Correspondence; Letter No. 1,357, New York, March 28.—The arrest of eleven burglars whose ages varied between eight and fifteen years, has suddenly awakened our community to the startling fact that more than one-half of the robberies and assaults that occupy the attention of our criminal courts are the work of coarsely reared boys, between the ages of twelve and eighteen years.

DOWAGER EMPRESS MARIE OF RUSSIA.

Who is now visiting her sister Queen Alexandra, of England, for the first time in years. It is said that her trip to London was taken also to give relief from the constant fear of anarchists in St. Petersburg.

scholar, always at the head of his class, who had won dozens of diplomas for proficient scholarship and excellent deportment, and who had graduated next week. When he was arraigned before the magistrate his sisters brought his diplomas and medals as an evidence of his good character, but the black-jack's pocket full of plunder outweighed them all, so he will be sent to Ward's Island to remain there till he is twenty-one.

What has brought about this fearful condition among our boys? The answer is simple. This city and the entire country is flooded with that class of "yellow literature" which exalts the thief and the card-sharp and makes him appear as a hero and a martyr, and paints the honest man who suffers through him as a coward and a poltroon.

Our opera season is ended, and now is a good time to figure on the profit and loss. The cost of Grand Opera at the Metropolitan in the past year has been, in round numbers, $2,000,000, and now that all the bills are paid the trial-balance on the ledger shows a deficit of $70,000. Mr. Conreid has conducted the grand opera at the house for the last two seasons, and as far as quality is concerned nothing could be more satisfactory, but the cost has been fearful.

depart, leaving nothing but a memory behind. They are the most exciting class with which the public has to deal. They absorb everything while here, and they leave nothing behind when they go. Every dollar goes to Europe and to such that even the wealth of our country is depleted. Do not understand from what I have said that I am averse to grand opera, for I love good music and believe the nation is better that cultivates and encourages it. My dislike is the enormous prices paid to foreign singers, who grasp everything and yield nothing. The man who builds an opera-house like that of Oscar Hammerstein, gives something that we can see and enjoy ourselves in during years to come. The money that he has he spends here. Let our rich people who support in reckless extravagance the present grand opera, encourage home talent, and we will soon see the best teachers in Europe flocking to the United States and it would not be long before Europe would be sending to us for prima donnas, contraltos, tenors, baritones, and basses to supply the places of those who are now sailing away from us. We could then have grand opera for a million as well as for the millionaires. There are several fine vocal teachers in the city now, and most American prima donnas that Paris has seen and heard receive the best part of their vocal training in New York. Let me here mention for the benefit of our British, German and Italian cousins, that the love of music is not a new feature in our American life. Fifty and a hundred years ago there was not a village or hamlet that boasted a dozen houses, a blacksmith shop, a post office and a hotel, but it had its singing school around which gathered some of the brightest and dearest memories of the past. It was there that the smart young fellows met their plans of their future lives, happily consummated later on. Who can ever forget those delightful sleigh rides, through the sharp, crisp, frosty winter nights, as we dashed over the snowy road, smooth as a sheet of glass, while the happy company was packed in the straw like sardines in a box, and the sleigh was never so full, but there was room for one more. Happy nights those! Yes, and bright now among the golden memories of the past. We gathered our inspiration to sing from "The Boston Academy," and "The Carman's Song." It is true, that we knew nothing of Verdi, Wagner, of vaudeville or of grand opera with its $3,000 a night and $15 for a parquette seat in baldhead row, but if in hours of inspiration, we desired to stir the hearts of the sinners present with something less classic but more effectual, we gave them, "Ninety and Nine," and made the welkin ring with the soul-stirring strains of "Hold the Fort." These memories are an oasis on the desert sands of life. They are golden dreams, fateless and beautiful, and are all that remain to me of life, unseen and intangible to others, but to me solid facts that uphold the pillars of Eternity. So that, with humble spirit I can hide my time, can watch and wait—
