There Will Be 200 Graduates on the 24th—Convocation Also to Be Held on October 16th Hereafter. Final arrangements have not yet been made for Queen's convocation proceedings on the 24th, but it is unlikely that there will be any notable visitors on that occasion. This year the medical graduates will attend with those of the other faculties for graduation, and with 200 students to be "capped" by the chancellor the time for other proceedings will be limited. There was some talk last year of doing away with the laureation ceremony, but Principal Gordon, when asked yesterday about the matter, stated that he didn't think it would be abolished. It was an interesting ceremony for Queen's students and their friends, and the time-honored custom would likely remain as long as it was at all possible to retain it. The university authorities intend hereafter to hold convocation proceedings on University day, Oct. 16th, when most of the honorary degrees will be conferred. At that time noted visitors have a better chance to see the university in operation, and most of the students in attendance. At the spring convocation there are not more than one-third of the students present.

GREAT SLAUGHTER.

Seals, Valued at a Million Dollars, Are Captured. St. John's, Nfld., April 10.—This has been an eventful season in the history of the seal fishing industry, an avocation like which there is not another in the world, writes a correspondent of the Boston Post, between March 10th and April 20th— a brief six weeks—350,000 seals, valued at fully a million dollars, are captured by the twenty-four steamers and four thousand men engaged in this pursuit.

Three of the older captains, the last links with the bygone days before steam was introduced, have been struck off the list. Captain Arthur Jackson, the most renowned of the three, as a sealer, was a driven and eager of dauntless Viking, who lost four vessels under him but never lost a man, though he cruised from Greenland to the Levant, died early in February. Captain Samuel Blandford, the commander of the fleet, who had been for fifty years master of a sealer was stricken with paralysis in January, and Captain William Winsor, who at the age of sixty-seven started on a two hundred mile journey on foot and by dog sled to join his vessel, collapsed by the way and had to abandon the attempt.

At the onset of the current toward Labrador, where the flocks are deflected by the currents along the northern coast of Newfoundland, the sealers come upon their prey, and day and night are made hideous with the scenes that ensue. The mother seals fight gamely in defence of their young, but are driven off by sealers' clubs, and little ones are slaughtered in thousands. They are the best prizes, yielding the finest oil, and the skins and its adhering mass of fat are separately frozen in the vessel, cold has no value) and dragged to the ships.

The seals are found in immense herds or "patches," often covering a body of ice reaching beyond the range of vision, and it is not uncommon to find as many as 250,000 seals killed in one of these herds and brought to St. John's.

The seals are to be found also in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and four of the ships go there to hunt them, but twenty of the fleet operate on the Atlantic sea face of the island, their range extending from the Belle Isle Straits to the Grand Banks, which area of ocean is now covered with floe and berg ice, which owing to the great annoyance of trans-Atlantic shipping.

The great slaughter of young seals takes place between March 12th and 24th. The young ones are then too feeble to move, and there is no escaping the hunter's murderous club. Sometimes the mothers, alarmed at the noise which accompanies the onrush of the men, scramble to the blow holes in the ice by which they reach the water, and thus escape with their young.

The most horrible tragedy in the history of the flocks was that of the steamer Greenland in 1898. This ship was struck by a blizzard and the men were hunting for seals over the ice plain. They were left helpless while she was driven to sea. Two nights and a day elapsed before she reached them again, and when she did she had perished from hunger and cold. Some had gone mad from their sufferings, others had collapsed from exhaustion and been frozen stiff, a few were killed by fragments of ice tossed about while others fell into the ocean and were drowned. Of the total only twenty-five bodies were recovered, the others having found a grave in the depths of the sea. About fifty survivors were frost-bitten, and it was a sad looking sight that returned to port that year.

GREAT BUILDING.

Dedication of the Carnegie Institute. Pittsburg, Pa., April 11.—The magnificent new building standing at the entrance of Schenley Park, this city, was dedicated today, with most elaborate ceremonies. It is a gift, as the epigram on the building declares, to "The People of Pittsburg." It is, indeed, a gift to the American nation, and the extraordinary attention that the ceremonies of dedication have attracted throughout the world is the best evidence that in the world's opinion, it is the creation of institutions like this which gives real elevation and dignity to any people. It is the most distinguished platform for the exhibition of the highest art in America. The attendance of men of distinction is beyond all precedent, including men who have won distinction in almost every avenue of the world's work, in art, in letters, in music, in scientific achievement, in education, in geographical exploration and in the service of the state, and among these men are at least thirty who have won high renown in Europe, including representatives from the most venerable institutions of learning in the world. At the moment of the dedication of the institute, embracing the five great departments of fine arts, museum, library, school of music and technical school, under one administration, the financial outlay for cost, equipment and endowment of all the main and branch buildings will amount to $25,000,000, a sum staggering to the mind even in this era of great fortunes and stupendous gifts. In Europe, under slow growth of royal patronage and state aid, such an institution could not reach so great a cost in less than five hundred years. In Pittsburg the loving kindness of a single man has created, in the short space of ten years, an institution unique in its comprehensiveness. When the building is completed it will not be the finish, but only the beginning of its real usefulness. A community that has until now been held down to hard facts will be launched into the pursuit of ideas. Secretary Church, of the institute, says: "Before Mr. Carnegie gave us this splendid gift there was nothing here but the material life, and it required a vivid imagination in any man to pierce the smoke clouds that rolled overhead, and realize that there was any such thing as an intellectual life beyond. I have been amazed at the popularity which the institute has won for itself. I have seen men from the mills and employes from the street-car lines, whose toilsome lives would make one think they had no time for the pursuit of leisure, pouring through the various halls of the institute, demanding high class literature in the library, studying masterpieces of painting in the art halls, investigating the wonders of science in the museum, and listening with close attention to the organ recitals in Music Hall. Besides this, ten thousand boys and girls have applied for admission to the technical school. With its five great departments under one control, there is no other institution just like it in the world."

The deposit is a most valuable one, and the clay produced is of such a quality that it can be manufactured into hard pressed brick for ordinary use and can also be polished up and used for indoor decorations and face buildings. As far as is known there is only one other deposit of the same character in America, located near Indianapolis.

The first annual meeting of the company will be held in this city shortly, when the election of officers will take place and other business of that description be settled up.
