Here the visitors' horses were turn ed astray, and the headman, telling hem that they would not be allowed to re-enter Natal, signified that they would have to continue without their horses, and would have to carry their saddles. After a night spent under surveillance in a cave, the Basutos maintaining a close watch upon their captives, the party made their escape by means of a strategem, in which they were assisted by their Basuto guide, who helped them to capture the horses and led them back to the pass by which they had entered.
