The matters in dispute covered almost every typical feature of the labor problem, such as rates of wages, hours and employment, including night and day work, overtime, both as hours and pay, classification of men, the number and status of apprentices, the promotion of helpers, improvers, etc., the reinstatement of men on strike or lockout, some of them for over two years, and the general recognition of the windon. The interest manifested by the Grand Trunk railway was sufficiently evidenced by the fact that Mr. Hays, Mr. Fitzhugh and Mr. Robb attender throughout the entire sittings of the board, being specially interested, Mr. Hays said at the close of the cas men were also well represented from the ranks, the officers of the union and by counsel. Many and various were the influences which had entered into the moulding and making of these representative men. The home, the school, the university and the church, each had played its part, and each had given its contribution, and to each and all of these institutions these men acknowledged themselves under obligations. But it seemed that too little account was taken, by each writer, of his indebtedness to the larger community of which he was a member. Of course the home, the school, the university and the church were constit uent elements in that larger commun ity, each having its place and part in the moulding and making of that community. But the community itself, in its wholeness, had been a factor, and no mean factor, in making these men what they were as representative men large a field might be disposed of.
