The presentment is referred to only as showing the wide latitude that has been given to juries, or that has been assumed by them, in their reports to the court. It is a question if they were ever meant to deal with any question not directly connected with the administration of justice, and may not be amiss, now that an appeal is to be made to the attorneygeneral, to have their duties defined. The petit jury is expected always to take the instruction of the judge on points of law, and it may be necessary to have the grand jury take counsel from the same source as to what places they are to visit and what subjects they are to discuss in their reports.
