All this outdoor work tends to give the laboring women a weather-beaten, mannish ap pearance, but I found myself regarding them with quite as much, if not more, respect than many of their idler sisters with "made up" complexions, pencilled eyebrows, and reddened lips.

Though I have now spent two er is drunk, I have seen no drunkenness. Where light wines and beer are the universal beverages, intoxication is rarely encountered. I recall the figure of a man I saw lying prone on the sidewalk in Rome, compelling passersby to step over him or into the road. Yet it did not occur to me that he was intoxicated. Rather that he was following the custom of the many idlers of the country, in taking advantage of the only piece of sunlight on the street to have a warm sun-bath, the weather being somewhat chilly. Where as, for instance, in Vienna-half the population seem to be perpetually eating and drinking in the general sobriety is remarkable. The absence of bars and of ardent spirits, the cafes, no doubt conduce to this. There may be evils possibly resulting from these customs, but drunkenness is assuredly not one of them. -C. O.
