Three months ago, as I walked up the Puician hill at Rome for the first time, I paused to look out over the city beside another man similarly occupied. We fell naturally into conversation. "You are from Ireland," I remarked. "How did you know that?" he asked. I replied that his speech unmistakably indicated that much to me. "And yet," said he, "I am a Norwegian, but I have lived to the accommissioned to obtain the properties."

"I believe so," was his reply, "but I fear I am not a good judge," he added, apparently quite conscious of the inference we might draw from his words. And yet he was the picture of a sober and sedate young man. I do not wish to say that the drinking habits of the people of Ireland are worse than those of Great Britain in general, where indeed there has been a marked change for the better in recent marked change for the better in recent years. But I have seen a few drunken folk in Ireland, a sight almost unknown on the continent, as I have elsewhere remarked.
