THE PARASITIC CUCKOO. Leaves Sparrows' Nests, to Live

A curious little event in natural history is recorded from Hertford-shire, in a thrush's nest, built in a spinney separating a private park CONDENSED ADVERTISING from the road were found two cuckoo's eggs along with three thrush's eggs. The eggs were of the commonest type —white-grounded and thickly speckled and blotched with ruddy browns. It is, of course, by this time suffiver, the victim being S. Lefevre, aged ciently proved that the cuckoo's egg thirty-eight years, a tradesman in the rarely resembles with any remarkable closeness the eggs of the foster-mother, but this speckled pair against the three blue eggs of the thrush gave a rare and surprising contrast. One may perhaps connect the usual selection with the weather. In this district a lamentable number of land cuckoos are parasitic on quent special places have special pre-dilections, and in this part of Hertfordshire they have more frequently than is usual preferred the hedge-
