They came through funnels, bolted through portholes and into the sea with squeals of terror. Some ran into the rigging and took headers off the main truck.

The last rat to come out of the hold was the patriarch of the herd, of tremendous proportions and almost white with age. Close at his heels was the Inagua wildcat. Up to the bow they raced, over the bulwark and along the hauser chains. The rat jumped and the cat followed, and the next instant the stem of the Valdivia passed over them. Not a rat was seen the rest of the
