Young Writers. Most of the young men who come raw into the trade of writing come with high aims; they have literary standards; they have worthy ambitions. But they soon discover that the trade is not the making of literature, They have not been prepared by a reasonable amount of practice even to understand what writing day by day, means. They have their heads full of literary notions, which are, as a rule, very false notions. They are not prepared for the orderly prac-tice of a useful art. They hope rather to do some great piece of work quick-ly. They are in a false relation to work and to life. When the inevitable disillusion comes, they either lose ambition, and sink into hopeless drudgery, or they lose their bearings and run off into "yellow" journalism, where they can at least do spectacullar jobs and earn (for a while) more
