HIGH COURT CASES

KINGSTON TOWNSHIP TRESPASS ACTION.

Judgment Was Reserved—Grantford Carriage Company Wins a Case Against Joseph Lemmon of This City.

The regular sitting at high court opened, Thursday afternoon, before Judge Britton. The first case was Albertson vs. Harpell, for trespass. T. J. Rigney appeared for the plaintiff, and J. L. Whiting for the defendant. The case arose over the using of a road across lots 13 and 14 in the township of Kingston. Timothy Donovan, father-in-law of the defendant, owned the west half of the first lot and all the second, the east half of No. 13 belonging to the plaintiff. A road across both lots had been used by the defendant's employees for driving cattle, drawing timber and farm produce. By the consent of the plaintiff's father, the defendant's father-in-law put gates at each end of the road. Shortly after both parties had passed away, the plaintiff sent a lawyer's letter to Mr. Harpell, forbidding him to use the road. No notice was taken of any notice. Witnesses said that was used to stop him by the plaintiff, even to piling wood in front of the gates.

The first witness called by Mr. Rigney was Mrs. Joseph Harpell, wife of the defendant, and daughter of the late Timothy Donovan, original owner of the property. The witness said she remembered the road in dispute for thirty-six years. She told of how the gates were put there, why the road was used for and of the actions of the plaintiff after her father's death, about them using the road, to draw their produce from one farm to the other. The property has changed hands numerous times, and been leased many times, making a rather complicated case.

William Smith, was a tenant of the Donovan property for eight years, leaving there ten years ago. He used the road in dispute, and had travelled it many times, during his tenancy.

Under cross-examination, he became quite noisy in some of his remarks, and when asked by Mr. Whiting how many drinks he had taken to-day, answered, "None of your business, not a drop." Four other witnesses were called for the defence, who knew of the road and had travelled it, but no points were brought out.

William Albertson, the plaintiff, was the first witness called by Mr. Whiting. He told of arrangements made by his father with the defendant's father-in-law, whereby he was to have a right of way for so many years. After both people died the property fell to him, and he had the fences fixed, and told Harpell that he could not use any more. Witnesses said that was a good many years ago, and no one had used it until this spring, when the defendant used it whenever he pleased. The first time he used it witnesses told him to stop next time he sent him a lawyer's letter, and the third time he saw him do it he took action.

Under cross-examination, witness could not tell when the defendant mentioned were made, nor could tell anything about them, only that they were made.

Numerous other witnesses were produced by Mr. Whiting, who swore that he mentioned were made, nor could tell anything about them, only that they were made.

The next case was an action brought by the Brantford Carriage company against Joseph Lemmon, to recover five carriages, which he converted to his own use. T. J. Rigney appeared for defendant, and A. B. Cunningham for the carriage company. These rigs were shipped to A. E. Harding, who assigned them in August last. The Brantford people sent a man down to claim the goods on hand, and Mr. Lemmon refused to give them up, saying he would do so in a few days. The salesman of the carriage company was produced and corroborated this.

Joseph Lemmon was put in the box when the man called, but at the present time he only one, having sold the others. Documentary evidence presented in court showed that the rigs were sent to Harding, and that the title was not to change until the rigs were paid for, therefore, they never left their hands practically.

His lordship took the view in summing up the evidence, and said that the plaintiffs should recover, as the title of the property never changed. The carriage company was awarded $387, the value of the rigs.

HELD A MASS MEETING

JOHN B. LENNON'S ADDRESS IN A. O. H. HALL

Strong Protest Against Fining of Two Tailors in Police Court Recently—Will Ask For Dismissal of Magistrate Farrell.

Nearly every seat in the A.O.H. hall, Brock street, was taken last night at the mass meeting, called for the purpose of hearing an address delivered by John B. Lennon, general secretary of the Journeymen Tailors' Union of America, and treasurer of the American Federation of Labor. The audience, for the most part, was made up of union men, with a large representation from the female members of the tailors' union. The president of the tailors' union, Mr. James, occupied the chair, and enjoined with him on the platform were Hugh Robinson, the general organizer, who has been in the city for some time, in connection with the tailors' strike, and Walter Lee, secretary of the Kingston Trades and Labor Council.

Mr. Lennon was introduced by the president, and spoke for about an hour. In his opening remarks he said: "I am glad to see you here tonight, and to see the tailors' union represented here. There is no line separating the workers in Canada, from the workers in the States. He felt sorry to think that some men were of the opinion that the labor movement knew no boundary, there was no line separating the workers in Canada, from the workers in the States. He felt sorry to think that some men were of the opinion that the labor movement knew no boundary, there was no line separating the workers in Canada, from the workers in the States.

Continuing, Mr. Lennon stated that a great many held that there was no need for organized labor. He understood that there were girls working in Kingston for $1 per week and sometimes less, and also boys working for wages that were altogether too meagre to furnish men with a comfortable living. If there was no work for the labor movement, it would then have to be admitted that the character of the men and women growing up was not worth the while taking care of. If the people themselves did not look after this matter, there was no other body that would. True, the employer was kind and consulted the working people as circumstances would permit, but he had no time to look after the interests of the working class. This must be attended to by the working class themselves. The tailors' strike went to show that there was something wrong while in the union.

"This strike has now been going on for three months," added the speaker, "and I want to say that the International headquarters can take care of the matter. It is just about as well if they were employed. As to who win out, I cannot say, but I will say that as long as Kingston is a city, the tailors will maintain a union. This contest here has taught us a deep lesson of the need of an organization."

There was much safety in keeping identified with the International Union. The Iron Moulders Union of America had, during the last five years, spent $5,000,000 in their fight against the Manufacturers' Association. Several of these contests had taken place in Canada, and in spite of the strong opposition, the results had been worth while.

The speaker reviewed at some length the progress of the labor movement in the States, the different organizations had accomplished great things. In the state of Massachusetts the career of organized labor dated back 100 years. These organizations had brought about protection of children and men in the shops. Politicians claimed the credit of having introduced the proper bills for elections; this credit was due the trade unionists who originated the scheme, and not the politicians.

The work of the miners in the States was referred to. The men were now receiving over double the wages they were given five years ago, and were now able to make a far better living. Fifteen years ago these men could not even send their children to school. Nowadays they could do this, live in a better house, and have the means to occasionally even take a holiday once in a while. There was a great deal of talk about the "open" and "closed" shop. The speaker considered that these were terms to be used by the shopkeepers, not by the workers.

Trade unions had accomplished a great deal. For instance, children had been taken out of shops and placed in the playground. This work had not been done by the church, or any fraternal societies. No effort was made by religious bodies to have the wages of the women made the same as men, in some classes of work. The government in Canada had not even taken up the matter.

The work of the trade union was also a moral and religious movement, and would, in time, be recognized as such.

In his closing remarks, Mr. Lennon reviewed the situation in the tailors' strike, stating that in the last seven years there had been no increase in wages, and were now asking for an increase of ten per cent. "And they are going to have it," he said. "Upon the success of the tailors' strike depends the success of other unions."

At the close of Mr. Lennon's address, William Dunlop moved that he be tendered a vote of thanks for his excellent discourse, and this motion was carried by a unanimous vote.

Mr. Robinson then spoke briefly. He said that everyone would agree that a great mistake had been made in that the tailors had not asked for a change in the wage scale during the past seven years. Every two years a change was expected in prices. The strike in Kingston was more of necessity than of choice. However, this was not the first strike in Kingston.

The speaker reviewed the appointment of an alien labor officer, brought about by the trade unions. There was need of organized labor, he contended, to show that they would not be "hoodwinked" by scheming politicians.

The Labor party was now placing candidates in the field for municipal honors. The party had ceased to be they would first see that they had equipped, and then go ahead. They would demand that their rights be granted.

Mr. Robinson said that there appeared to be a feeling on the part of some of the tailors that if an organizer came to a city at the time of a strike to stir up trouble to build a gulf between the employer and the employee. He wished to most emphatically deny this. The work of an organizer was to endeavor to better the situation between the employer and the employee.

The speaker, in his closing remarks, stated that he believed that peace would be restored again, and supreme between the striking tailors and their employers.

After Mr. Robinson resumed his seat James Lee moved the following resolution, which was carried by a standing vote:

"Resolved, that this mass meeting assembled, do hereby protest against the maximum fine imposed by Magistrate Farrell on the two persons before him on the charge of intimidation, and consider it an outrageous insult to organized labor, and be it further resolved, that this meeting petition the Trades and Labor council to take the matter up by petitioning the attorney-general's department for the dismissal of the said magistrate."

After the passing of this resolution the meeting adjourned, and afterwards Mr. Lennon was tendered a banquet at the Windsor hotel by the members of the tailors' union.
