Lord Beauchamp, replying in behalf of the government, admitted that cattle driving had increased during the past year, but said this was the sole sign of agrarian conditions coming worse. The government plored the cattle raids, but the speaker declared the country was no more lawless than during certain periods of Premier Balfour's administration.

The government, he added, following Gerald Balfour's precedent, when he was chief secretary for Ireland, 1895-1900, had no intention of viving the crimes' act as suggested.
