BRITISH SOVEREIGNS

THE KIND OF HAND WORKING THEY DID.

Characteristic Styles of the British Kings—Queen Elizabeth Possessed All the Elements of the Pen.

King Henry VIII. wrote a strong hand, but he seldom had a good pen. He seems to have written with the haste and vehemence with which he spoke, and hence the untidy destruction of many an honest goose-quill.

Edward VI. wrote in a fair, legible, but somewhat effeminate hand, and managed to complete a neat manuscript diary; but the unfortunate boy had barely learned to write when he ceased to reign.

Queen Elizabeth, thanks to the pains of her assiduous tutor, Roger Ascham, wrote an upright hand, after the manner of the Italian school, and had acquired "all the elegancies of the pen," according to the notions of polite society in the sixteenth century.

James I. wrote a slovenly scrawl, strongly indicative of that personal negligence which he carried into all the little things of life.

Charles I. wrote a fair, open, Italian hand more correctly, perhaps, than any monarch who preceded him on the English throne.

Charles II. wrote a little, fair, running hand. He often wrote in odd situations, and his natural restlessness and vivacity prevented his penmanship from having the dignity and repose of that of his illustrious but unhappy father.

James II. wrote a large, fair hand, and Queen Anne's writing was round and fair, but a servile copy of that of her writing tutor.

The autographs of the Georges, and of William IV. were for the most part the Charles I. style, but beyond this had no special characteristics.

Queen Victoria wrote a large, graceful, old-fashioned Italian hand.

Specter of Revolt in India. India is in the throes of revolution, says Saint Nihal Sing, of Rawalpindi, Punjab, India.

The press despatches that have found their way into American newspapers fail to give a comprehensive picture of the real situation in Hindostan.

Lord Curzon, on the eve of his assumption of the Vice-Royalty, declared India to be "the pivot of the British Empire."

"If this Empire," he emphatically declared, "lost any other parts of its dominions, we could survive; but if we lost India, the sun of the Empire would set."

BUILD TWO SHIPS FOR ONE.

W. T. Stead Would Have Britain Double Germany's Efforts.

Mr. Stead, who was one of the first to interest in the navy, has in the new issue of the "Review of Reviews" an outspoken pronouncement on the question of maintaining the British navy and laying down two ships to one in answer to the German program.

There is no question," says Mr. Stead, "as to what John Bull will reply to the German program, be it little or big. He will say that he is sorry, but if it must be so he cannot help himself."

"We shall bring forward no imposing counter program. But when the Kaiser lays down one keel we lay down two. That is the formula of safety."

"We shall not be any worse friends with Germany because she wishes to alter the status quo to our detriment. It is a fair challenge and we shall accept it in the same spirit in which we accepted the challenge for the blue ribbon of the Atlantic."

There were, however, others who had their own theories as to the disappearance of Jane Owen. Some of these were related to a correspondent who visited the spot where the remains were buried.

There existed in the history of Jane Owen a collection of circumstances which lent color to the supposition that she had met with a violent end.

An extraordinary story of a delirious patient's mad act comes from Belfast.

A cat may look at a king, but it is sometimes at the cat's peril—at least so it would seem judging from this anecdote recorded for three centuries.

The then poet laureate of England was once dining at the home of his brother-in-law, Professor Lushington, and among the guests was an inoffensive stranger who, never having had the honor of being in the British company before, every now and then stole a glance of curiosity at the illustrious poet.

What woman has ever availed herself of the privilege of proposing in leap year? Nevertheless, it is interesting to discover whence the idea arose.

Between them the Emperor of China, and the Viceroys of India, govern more than half the population of the world.

FORGOTTEN.

Story of a Welsh Tragedy—Human Remains Found.

On the crest of a melancholy hill overlooking the wide Conway Vale stands a lonely farm, called Penrhall Inco.

The money was being counted in the kitchen, the servant observed: "Don't make so much noise with the money, somebody might be listening."

There were, however, others who had their own theories as to the disappearance of Jane Owen. Some of these were related to a correspondent who visited the spot where the remains were buried.
