14 PRINCES STREET

GOT RICH AS MINER

SACRIFICED HIS TITLE FOR A SHOP GIRL.

Coins $30,000 in Colorado Copper—Welcomed on Business Visit to Berlin By All Friends.

Denver, Colo., Feb. 10.—It has come to light that in Barren City, Fremont county, Colorado, Hans Frederick Barnes is really Count Haps Frederick von Hochberg, of the illustrious Pless family, of Germany, and a nephew of Princess Marie von Saxe-Weimar, and for many years a playmate of Crown Prince William. The count has given up his title to wed a shop girl, and he has further relinquished all claim to his inheritance and has become an American mine promoter. In less than one year he has accumulated over $30,000 in cash and a fourth interest in a copper mining company which is producing ore.

This young scion of German nobility created a sensation in court circles some time ago, when he handed in his commission as first lieutenant in the Royal Foot Guards and then came to this country, where he was engaged as chauffeur at Tarrytown, N.Y., and later married at Ossining, N.Y., Louise Carow, whom he had known in Germany as a shop girl.

The count, with his young bride and baby, are now living in Barnes City, Colo. Count von Hochberg has done that which no other mine promoter in America has done—he has sold stock to Germany's royal family. Several of his wealthy and titled relatives have invested in his mining company, among them being Prince Henry of Reuss, his great uncle, and Duke of Pless, his uncle. It is said the crown prince also has stock in this company. At any rate it is estimated that at least $70,000 in stock has been sold by von Hochberg to the German nobility, and he has another plan on foot, when more stock will be taken by the young man to be offered to his wealthy relatives for sale at par.

The mine promoting scheme, in which the count is now engaged, was responsible in some degree for his renunciation of the name of Hochberg for the name of Barnes. The story that leads up to this mining adventure begins more than a year ago. The count had been selected for a military career by his family and was once in daily attendance at the imperial palace as an officer of the kaiser's personal bodyguard. However, the count's military duties were not so confining but that he could ramble about Berlin. In one of his ramblings he met Louise Carow, who was working in a shop, and became infatuated with her. Some time elapsed, then a scandal came to the ears of the count's noble father. It was intended that the young count should marry a princess in June of last year, and preparations were being made for the wedding. The father of the nobleman became enraged and demanded to know what he intended to do, his young Frederick said calmly: "I will marry the girl."

The count's father then determined to send him to America to travel. He came to New York city, and then determined he would no longer accept the kindness of his father, so he secured a place as chauffeur with Maxwell-Briscoe at Tarrytown, N.Y. In the following August he cabled to Louise Carow to come to him. She came in September of the same year and they were married at Ossining. The story of the marriage, of course, spread broadcast in Germany and scandalized the court. Many business offers came to the count. A playwright quickly wrote a play around the story of the count and his shop girl bride. It was submitted to the count with a proposal that he take the stellar part, but this offer was rejected.

Soon after an offer came to drive an automobile up Pike's Peak. Such a feat would be a big advertisement for the company, and since it was fraught with danger the price offered was great, but his wife would not consent to his risk of his life. Count Frederick continued to act as chauffeur, yet with his bride he was very happy. Then the mining fever seized the count. It happened in this way: Noah Barnes had read of the romantic and sensational career of Count von Hochberg. Barnes was a mining man from Colorado, and it dawned upon him that to secure his name and cooperation would mean much for the success of the mining concern. Barnes visited and convinced von Hochberg and when Barnes returned to his Colorado camp the count was his companion.

While prospecting the German nobleman came across veins of copper, which he staked off, and it afterwards became the property of a holding concern. Mr. Barnes, an experienced mining promoter, organized the Cottonwood Creek Copper company. The company was chartered under the laws of the state of New York with a capital of $300,000. The count was made secretary of the concern and his name and photograph were displayed prominently on all the prospectus.

The following spring the company was able to put stock on the market. During the winter the count was busy with his fluent pen, writing pamphlets, the greatest of which was "Colorado's Golden Glories," which depicted in eulogistic terms the rich opportunities for investors in mines. Special attention was paid to his own company. All of the count's literary efforts were printed in German, for the company was desirous that they should fall into the hands of readers in Germany, a field quite unopened.

Stock was sold on the New York curb and a dividend of 5 per cent. was guaranteed on a $115,000 issue of stock. In the spring the count determined to sail for Germany. His wife and child went with him. He stayed at the Kaiserhof in Berlin, but his wife remained with her relatives. His old friends flocked to see him and the hotel was the scene of many brilliant gatherings. Count Frederick called to see his relatives, where he was highly received except by his father, Count Bolko von Hochberg, head of Rohmstock Castle and Royal director of music at Berlin.

In consequence several weeks were spent. His fellow officers in the army
