STRANGE CIRCUMSTANCE.

Coffins Are Missing in Family Grave.

London, Feb. 11.—A strange event has started the unusually quiet little hamlet of Hall Green, near Birmingham.

Twenty-six years ago a married couple named Turner purchased a small piece of ground in the parish churchyard for the purpose of a family burial place.

A short while afterward they had occasion to use the grave, a young son and daughter having died within a brief period of each other. The funerals took place, and there are people living in the district who can recall the ceremony.

The father himself died last week, and arrangements were made for the interment to take place.

While engaged in opening the grave, the gravediggers came across an inscription plate which had been on the little girl's coffin, but no trace of the coffin could be found. The other coffin, that was known to have contained the body of the boy, had also vanished.

When the diggers were getting toward the required depth a spade struck the coffin of a full-grown person, upon which the inscription—if there ever had been one—was undecipherable.
