The Astronomer Royal has condemn ed the proposal to "lengthen the day" made in the British parliament. The idea of the suggested change was ingenious. It was that at 2 a.m. or each of the four Sundays in April each year the standard time should be advanced twenty minutes. Women Of Argentina.

The women of the Argentine are a very well defined type, with certain general romance characteristics, and appointed and went away vowing yet not being particularly Italian, Spanish, or French. Almost without exception they are dark, with an olive tinge which some of the most respectable offset with powder; and this is not always an agreeable combination. But their eyes are bright and beautiful, and have so made trouble among the immigrants from northern countries that a young matron who looks like a Fernandez or a Garcia, is, in truth, Mrs. O'Donnell or Mrs. McLean. The strict Spanish customs regarding what is proper for women are relaxed somewhat here; but though work would close nominally at the young girls ride out freely at Palermo, and along the Calle Florida, they are not to be seen walking on the streets unchaperoned. History Repeated Itself.

Oil City Blizzard. Of the late genial and kindly hearted Henry Burtch it is told that, a good many years ago, while he held the position of janitor of Trinity Me thodist Episcopal church, the minister one summer Sunday morning delivered a sermon which, it appears, had been given by him once before, perhaps two or three years previous. On the Sunday in question, and during the progress of the sermon, a violent thunderstorm came up and created some fittle nervousness among the congregation. After the services were over, and as the minister was about to leave the building, he met the janitor. "Henry," he said, "that was a pretty severe storm while I was preaching
