FOREST FIRE PROTECTION.

The Need is Very Great Say Those Who Know.

Fire is the greatest enemy the forest has, and, before it is worth while attempting any scientific management of the forests, some means must be Fame Among the Artisans of out of it, so that there may be some certainty of our having a forest to manage. The amount of damage done to the forests by fires in times before any protective system was established is simply incalculable; it has often been said, and probably even falls short of the truth, that for every dollar's worth of timber taken by the lumbermen from the valley of the Ottawa river, one of Canada's greatest lumbering districts, fires have destroyed ten dollars' worth.

Most in evidence is the destruction done by "crown" fires, fires which get up into the foliage of the trees. In many tracts of the wooded districts of Canada mile after mile of country has been swept over by such a fire, and of what was once a thrifty, green forest only blackened stumps and tree trunks remain. Sometimes the consequences are even more serious, and much life and property is destroyed. The Miramichi, N.B., fire of October, 1825, destroyed 160 lives and a quarter of a million pounds sterling, in property; and two such fires in Wisconsin-the Peshtigo fire of 1871 and the Hinckley fire of 1904-were responsible for the loss of 1,700 lives and many millions of dollars' worth of property.

A vast amount of loss is also done by "ground" and "surface" fires, fires which burn in the soil of the orest or run along the surface and lick up the dead leaves and other debris of the forest. While not much timber is consumed by the fire itself. the fire damages the bases and roots of the trees, and through the wounds thus made fungi gain entrance to the tree and cause the rotting of the wood. In parts of the largest dominion forest reserve (the Riding Movntain reserve, in Manitoba), especially among the aspen or white poplar, three out of every four tree are found to be damaged in this way. The area has been repeatedly burned over; the trees were thus wounded. the fungus spores gained entrance and the above result followed. Insects may also gain access to the tree trunks in this way. In view of these facts the importo the bride's house when the evening tauce of fire protection in the forest came, to bring her to his own house, can easily be realized. The great where the wedding feast awaited thing to be done is to discover and them. Young men and women went to put out the fire before it gets a start, and this is the great aim of the fire "Then," says the gospel, "shall the patrol systems instituted by the dokingdom of heaven be likened unto ten minion and several of the provincial
