A Growing Menace.

ome Journal, Toronto. The more or less frequent reports of cases where medical men lend assistance to the contravention of the laws of nature and of the land in the endeavor to save young women from the const sences of their folly, give cause for grave concern. It is bad enough to have quacks and charlatans secretly at this kind of business, but if the medical profession is to encourage it, where will it end? The only hope of stopping wholesale murder lies in making the punishment so severe that those on the one hand who are tempted to interfere with the natural result of their indiscretion will realize the grave danger, while those who are inclined to assist them will be led to hesitate before doing so. But until the man is made to feel as keenly as the woman the result of departure from the path of virtue, there will be little hope of eradicating of even minimizing this side-stepping of the laws of society and of God.
