Poetical Selections.

Listen!
Ella Wheeler Wilcox.
Whoever you are, as you read this,
Whatever your trouble or grief,
I want you to know and to heed this—
The hour draweth near with relief.

No sorrow, no woe, is unending, Though heaven seems voiceless and dumb;
So sure as your cry is ascending, So surely an answer will come.

Whatever temptation is near you Whose eyes on these simple lines fall, Remember, good angels will hear you And help you to stand if you call.

Though stunned by despair, I beseech you Whate'er your fancy, your need, Believe when these printed words reach
you.
Believe you were born to succeed.

The Vastness Of The Night.

Louise Chandler Moulton.
When we confront the vastness of the night,
And meet the gaze of her eternal eyes, How trivial seem the garnered gains we prize.
The laurel wreath we flaunt to envious light,
The flower of love we pluck for our delight,
The mad sweet music of the heart that dies
An instant on the listening air, then dies—
How short the day of all things dear and bright!

The everlasting mocks our transient strife,
The pagan of the universe whirls by This little sphere with petty turmoil rife—Swift as a dream and fleeting as a sigh—
This brief delusion that we call our life, Where all we can accomplish is to die.

Contrast.

By Nora Archibald Smith in Independent.
A foam-white daisy, with golden heart,
Is swaying out in the meadow;
The grasses whisper, the swallows dart,
And cool in the elm tree's shadow.
Everything's crystalline-fresh and fair, Everything's turned to flower, Tribe into butterfly, feet into wings, Touched by the summer's power.

A pallid child with a tumbled head,
Is playing down in the gutter;
The air is heavy with noisome scent,
And dense with the city's gutter.
Everything's wanting, but dust and heat, Everything's lacking but people, Everything's noisy, from folk in the street
To the noisy bells in the steeple.

Growing asunder, these flowers of earth, Yet are they sister and brother; Meadow-bred, gutter-bred, tho' they may be,
Still they have need of each other,
Shot in the hand of the timid child, Deep in the grasses lying,
Daisy will give him her golden heart
And leave him the more in dying.

In The Cool Of The Eve.

Alfred Noyes, in The Nation.
In the cool of the evening, when the low sweet whisp'ers wafted,
When the laborers turn them homeward,
And the weary have their will,
When the censurers of the roses o'er the forest aisles are
It is but the wind that cometh o'er the far green hill?

For they say 'tis but the sunset winds that wander through the heather, Rustle all the meadow-grass and bend the dewy fern;
They say 'tis but the winds that blow the reeds in prayer together, And fill the shallop pools with fire along the shadowy burn.

In the cool of the evening, when the sky all living, Slowly dying, but remembered, eye and loved with passion still—Hush! the faintest golden glow,
In the fading golden glory, Softly rustling as he cometh o'er the far green hill.

Indian Summer.

Sunny days
Soft with haze,
Restless winds adrift
Through the trees,
Every breeze
With the brown leaves twitting
Not a bloom
Whose perfume
Tempts the honeyed hummer,
Even the grass
Cries and craves
That is Indian summer.

Every tree
Flamboyantly
Coming winter noting,
Every cloud
Like a shroud
White and mystic floating,
Not a bird
But one new comer (bluebeard) Cautiously—
This is Indian summer.

Also—Worry's trace
On the face
Of the weary person, Thoughts of those Winter clothes
Almost set him cursing,
Where's that coin
He was going To save up? Ah, glimmer Grows his brow
Thinking now
Of his plans last summer!

The Year Is Old.

Geo. C. Wood, Newboro, Ont.
The Harvest is past and the Summer is waning,
And the chill winds and weeping of Autumn are here;
The dun shades of color bespeak the earth mourning, Beret of her fruitage, for old is the year.

All too brief was the breath and the bloom of spring's no
And the full-blooded richness of rosy-lipped June,
We were scarce, entranced with the Summer's adorning,
When the flower and the fruit were cut off at high noon.

O, sad is the heart at the thought of
With a flow and an ebb and a certain release
Like the tides of the sea at the full-flush all driving,
And their languid retreat to the ocean's surrender.

How strong the heart's hold on 'the hope of enduring,
How loath to grow old and to fade and decay;
Yet the way of all nature, her means of securing,
A life that is higher, for one that is high.

So with patience we wait for the spring's lure
The morning of life and the 'Spring's freshened bloom,
And so shall it be for the soul in life's morning, When o'er death lies the Master we conquer the tomb.

TRUTH AND FICTION.
Novelists Have Mixed Two in Their Portraits.

The method of certain novelists seems to be to take a single fact of the character of some one they know, ground around it other traits collected elsewhere, and then substantiate and personify the whole, says the Manchester Guardian.

They give it legs to stand on and a mouth to talk with. They put a hat on its head and a cane in its hand, and then—who shall say that Harold Skimpole is Leigh Hunt? Others again transfer the character bodily. That was James Payn's practice. In one of those delightful volumes in which he admits us into his library workshop he tells us that he found most of his characters among his acquaintances.

The person represented, he assures us, never recognizes his own portrait. But then his friends do, so sundry expedients to put people off the scent have to be adopted. If the original is tall he is pictured as short; if dark, as fair. Indeed Payn recommends the keeping of a list of dramatic personae, with the real names placed opposite the fictitious ones, to keep the novelist in mind as he works.

Sometimes, when the original is a public person, a writer of fiction will transfer him to his page without much disguise and much to the gratification of the reader. Who is not charmed to meet, in Meredith, Leslie Stephen in the "Egotist," Mrs. Norton in "Diana," La Salle in the "Tragic Comedians" and Robert Louis Stevenson in "The Amazing Marriage" Alphonse Daudet's practice in such cases was less genial. "It was a constant and growing tendency," says Sainsbury, speaking in a Wall Street.

Outing New York.
This is a wild region inhabited principally by bulls, bears and lambs. It is bounded on one end by Trinity Church—which is seldom over-crowded—and on the other by a river which is deep enough for the purpose. Bull fights and bear baiting are the main pastimes. The lambs are sheared whenever possible and the stock is watered frequently. Nothing is raised in this region except prices and panics. Formerly the inhabitants held aloof and said among themselves: "D—n the public," but owing to the scarcity of spring lambs, they are now becoming better mixers and go about saying: "It's one own fault." The destruction of Wall Street has often been predicted, but Americans are still fond of buying gold bricks.
