that the arts students of Queen's lack the hilarious spirit of those who learn physic and engineering?" "I'll tell you exactly why it is," replied my old companion, "Woman is the cause of it all. Ever since woman got a foothold at Queen's, she has changed things over there. The arts students exist day in in the same building as the female pedagogue, and her influence softens him. He can't yell like those 'divils' of medicine or play villainous pranks of the science men. The soft has hampered the poor arts men, who in rooms, used to be as bold a set as ever attended a school of learning. Look at those redecats at the military college water. The second ust over the water. They're a wild lot of scamps when they get going, and because there are no soldier women studying in the school. If there were, the cadets would be quieter lads. When a student has to associate constantly with women, he gets tamed, and if he associates long enough he'll become effeminate, as so many school lads are becoming because they are taught all their lives by school mistresses." The Lampman said he could go and give many instances of a like nature. He plames women for making the Queen's arts man a gentler being than he used

The Lampman went to "The Devil" on Thursday evening. He went there, he said, because one of the town clergymen had quoted an opinion that the play was worthless. The Lampman wanted to decide the question for himself, and so he occupied a prominent pew in Manager Branigan's play house. The first thing he noticed was the scarcity of women at the play. He was glad of this at first, but afterwards thought that the play was just as much a warning to women as to men. He disputes the assertion that the play is worthless. There is a deep underlying lesson in it, he says, if people will only see it, but if people go to the theatre only to be amused they will not see it The play is a warning to many men and women, for it shows how they are so easily led by the Devil. The Lampmar cannot see why the wiles of the Devil should not be shown from the stage just as well as from the pulpit.-THE TOWN WATCHMAN.
