THE CROSSING TRAGEDY

lot. Witness could not say how fast the train was travelling. As a rule the trains slowed up as they reached the crossing.

The Engineer's Story:
Hugh McEwen, engineer on the train from the east, known as No. 13, with engine No. 844, was next called. "We came through the bend," he said, "and struck two fog signals. This was a signal to slacken speed, and look for signals ahead. I slowed down the train, saw nothing ahead, and released my brake again. I saw the distant signal and the horse's signal all right for me. I then whistled for the crossing at the whistle board. I ran up, and for extra precaution I whistled for the second crossing. The fireman started to ring the bell. As soon as I whistled for the first crossing, the bell was rung continuously until the accident happened. I then approached the crossing till immediately before the accident happened. I saw a dark object loom up in front of the engine and then heard the noise in front of the engine. I told the fireman to light the torch, as we had struck something. I applied the brake immediately after I heard the noise, and stopped the train as quickly as possible. I took the torch and went to the front of the engine to see what was the matter. I found a wagon crosswise in front of the engine. I saw an object which I took for a buffalo. I asked someone to see what it was and closer investigation revealed the fact that it was the body of a man. There was some coal and sugar on the engine, which had evidently been in the wagon. "How fast were you running when you reached the fog signals?" "About twenty-five miles an hour." "How long does it take to make the trip from Brockville to Kingston?" "It takes one hour and twenty minutes." "This run was forty-eight miles, with five stops." "When witness released his brake, he did not think that the speed of the train was increased. When he blew the first whistle, he was going about twenty miles an hour. Witness said that he had run between Kingston and Brockville for about twenty-five years, and for the past six years constantly. For three or four years he had been on "No. 13," the local train which struck the rig. Witness could not see the rig, but could see the horses when they broke away. The rig was coming from the opposite side from him, and he could not see it until it was too late. John Wesley Lloyd, fireman on "No. 13," was sworn. "We were approaching Kingston at the usual rate of speed, about twenty-five miles an hour, when we struck the fog signals. I grabbed the bell cord, and the engineer applied the brakes; when we came to the semaphores there was a green light, for "all right." The engineer blew the whistle at both crossings, and witness rang the bell. Witness supposed that they were going about twelve or fifteen miles an hour, when they struck something at the crossing. He thought the scraper had struck the crossing. After the crash, the engineer told him to get his torch, as they had struck something. The witness then told of the finding of the body. Witness had been fireman on the road for ten years. He said he started to ring the bell after the fog signals were reached, and kept on ringing it until after the accident occurred. He did not see anything when the crossing was reached. The light at the crossing was not very good."
