

Uric Acid Gravel

Is Caused by the Kidneys Being Unable to Carry the Poisonous Waste Matters Out of the Blood.

The urine of persons suffering from uric acid or gravel is generally scanty and after it has stood a while, a reddish sediment like brick dust forms in it.

Those who pass gravel in any considerable quantity are usually troubled with inflammation of the kidneys, bladder and urinary organs, sour stomach, indigestion, heartburn, gout and rheumatism.

The Doctor's Quest.

Gamichet, the well-known artist, whose pictures of flowers are so celebrated, was just strolling along near the Saint Lazare station when someone touched him on the arm and, turning round, he found himself face to face with a certain Dr. Rigaud.

"Why, how are you, doctor?" said the artist, "I have not seen you for ages!"

"And what about my picture?" asked the doctor, as he shook hands.

Gamichet suddenly remembered in a vague sort of way an order which Rigaud had given him the previous winter at a ball, when the two men had been taking art.

"I have plenty in bloom now at Rueil. Come back with me and choose just what you like, and then stay and take luncheon with me."

It was a bright, sunny day, and Gamichet did not feel inclined to go back to his studio, so he accepted the doctor's invitation, and the two men crossed over the road arm in arm, and mounting the station steps, took tickets for Rueil.

On arriving there the doctor's carriage met them at the station, and they drove straight to the private lunatic asylum, where Dr. Rigaud lived.

Gamichet huddled instinctively at the sight of the high prison wall which surrounded the establishment, but when once the gates were open and he caught a glimpse of the garden, in the midst of which the house stood, his horror vanished.

The walls on this side were covered with climbing rose trees, clematis, honeysuckle and ivy; a green, velvety lawn formed a carpet all round the house, whilst the flower beds were filled with bright colored blossoms.

Dr. Rigaud conducted his guest to the conservatory, which was his special pride. There were standards of almost every variety, and the artist, who was also a connoisseur, was perfectly delighted at the choice before him.

"Upon my word, you make it worth while losing one's reason to come and live here," he exclaimed.

"Well, I hardly know about that," said the doctor, shaking his head. "I shall have to leave you for a time," he added, "as my patients are all waiting; it is the hour of my daily visit. We lunch at half-past 12, and it will take you some time to choose your flowers for my picture. Out any you like—don't forget them. Here Robiquet," he called to one of the keepers, "bring your knife and cut the roses for this gentleman. He will choose just what he likes."

As he said this and was hurrying away, the doctor, either from a professional habit or from absent-mindedness, winked slightly at the keeper and the latter interpreted this sign in his own way.

tonishment, the keeper closed the door and turned the key.

"What are you looking that door for?" he asked.

"Oh, it's all right, I assure you," remarked Robiquet coolly, keeping his back to the door.

"Kindly open it at once!" commanded the artist.

"Oh, there is no hurry. When our visitors come into this room they wait here until the doctor is at liberty to see them."

"Well, go and fetch the doctor, then."

"We never disturb him when he is at luncheon."

"But I have come to have luncheon with him!"

"Ah, that's a pity now, my poor fellow."

"Will you kindly remember your place?" said Gamichet, who was now furious.

The keeper shrugged his shoulders, and the artist, taking another tone, explained matters, gave his name and even told about the picture which he had had ordered. The keeper, however, had heard all kinds of stories in his time, and he remained perfectly impassive, allowing the poor idiot to mander on.

Gamichet grew more and more furious, and as he had the open knife with which they had cut the roses in his hand, Robiquet judged it prudent to call for help.

He did not look dangerous," he said to himself, as he pressed a knob just near him.

The next instant two strong fellows entered the room by another door. They seized hold of Gamichet, in spite of his protestations and struggles. The knife was wrenched out of his hand, and he was quickly put into the straight waistcoat. The three keepers then left him, after securely locking the doors and taking the keys with them.

Gamichet now began to shout for help, but on further observation he discovered that he was in a padded room, lighted from the top by a skylight and with no other windows. He might, therefore, just as well spare his strength, as his voice would not be heard outside.

RECORD OF DEATHS. Irishman Died at Age of 121—Men Living Longer.

A correspondent writes: "I have kept for many years a record of the deaths of persons over 90 recorded in the Times, and it is wonderful how they represent those of the upper classes, as each notice costs five shillings, and therefore the number of deaths must be very large. In 1898, for example, there were only 194. This year they are almost exactly double."

AMERICAN CRACKERS. Pilot Bread First Made in United States.

The first "cracker," produced in the United States, so far as known, was pilot or ship bread, which was a clumsy, crisp affair, which could not be used for the merchant marine for an article of food that would, unlike ordinary bread, keep for a prolonged period.

Let another variety was originated, the cold water cracker, which differed from the first chiefly in its smaller size, more compact texture and greater hardness. For a long time these two were the only goods known to the trade.

ENGLISH LYNCH LAW.

Cases of Justice Administered by Mob.

London Answers. The British are the most law-abiding nation in the world? It is only Denmark and perhaps Norway and Iceland that can hold a candle to us in this respect.

It is so unusual for Englishmen or Scotsmen to take the law into their own hands that the recent case in which Dr. Walford Bodie was mercilessly "ragged" after a jury had acquitted him, a "quack," caused a great sensation.

Lynch law is not unknown in this country, and there have been many cases of summary justice being meted out without the formality of trial. The most famous of records was that known as the Parsons Riot. On April 15, 1736, Capt. Porteous, commanded the military guard at the execution at Edinburgh of the famous smuggler Wilson. Wilson was very popular, for he had given up his own liberty to save a comrade.

The infuriated spectators pelted the guard with stones, and Porteous, fearing a rescue, ordered his men to fire. Seventeen persons were killed or wounded and Capt. Porteous was arrested and lodged in jail. A huge mob collected, stormed the prison, broke down the doors, hauled the unfortunate officer out into the Grassmarket and hanged him on a dyer's sign post.

There was a lynching episode in Darlington about nine years ago. The trouble started with some children being made ill by ice cream sold by Italian street vendors. Later a crowd mobbed the Italian hawkers.

One barrow was smashed to pieces, whereupon two of the Italians drew their knives. They were seized, disarmed and carried away to the river, into which they were flung. It was only through the exertions of the police that they were not both drowned.

A French giant, was being exhibited on the sands at Weymouth when two little children offended him by laughing. He ran at them and struck the boy and kicked the girl. Instantly the crowd made a rush at his tent and pulled it about his ears. The giant ran for his life, the crowd at his heels. There was a cab on the parade. The giant flung himself into it and shrieked to the driver to drive off, but the mob kept up the chase. Stones smashed through the windows of the cab, and had it not been for the police the giant and his agent both would have probably been killed.

At Thurston fifty women were obliged to waste their whole day at the suit of an assignee against a local draper. As hours passed and they thought of their uncooked dinners and uncooled children they got more and more angry. When the case was at last over they gathered and surrounded the draper's shop and fell upon him furiously. Capless and coatless he escaped, but they chased him. Only the very hardest running saved their quarry.

Fairs are greatly disliked by the police on account of rows that often ensue. The most serious affair in recent years was at a village near Wrexham in November last year. A family of gypsies offered a pig as a prize for climbing a greasy pole. After the contest the pig was not forthcoming. The crowd grew angry and threatened the gypsies. The latter, of whom there were four, snatched up rifles from their shooting gallery and opened fire. Nearly a score of persons were struck with bullets. Then the fat was in the fire with a vengeance. "Kill them!" roared the crowd, and there was a terrible rush. The gypsies had barricaded themselves in a van, whereupon the crowd broke up all their galleries and shows, piled the pieces round and proceeded to set them on fire.
