The Man On Watch.

The Lampman has not yet seen the comet, and he regards the astronomers as an aggregation of fakirs, after the way they hoodooed the inhabitants. It was prophesied that this generation would have great things to tell its grandchildren concerning the comet of 1910, but there will be nothing to tell about, except that the astronomers created a big comet scare for nothing.

There is a by-law which says that fireworks of any kind must not be set off on the streets of the town, the Lampman says. He would like to know why this by-law is not enforced. It would have been an easy matter for the peelers to have arrested fifty or more boys last Tuesday and filled the police station with them. The effect would have been convincing. The lads of the town are given too much latitude, and so are the storekeepers who sell dangerous fireworks, the Lampman claims. In some places not as large as Kingston the authorities will not allow firecrackers to be ignited on the thoroughfares.

At the recent Methodist district meeting, the Lampman is told that a discussion took place on the cost of keeping a horse. One parson said he could keep his nag for seventy-five dollars a year, and shocked his brethern, who wondered what kind of fare he gave the animal. However, it is quite easy to keep a horse for that amount of money when one has a stable. The Lampman knows a townsman who keeps his horse on fifty dollars a year. The Methodist ministers' discussion reminds him of a similar debate at an Ontario Synod session ten years ago, when the worthy clergymen of the district became quite warm in their talk on the horse question, and came to the conclusion that it was both cheaper and better to keep a horse than a wife, if a decision had to be made between the two, in a rural district.

The closing of the whiskey dispensaries for three hours on the day of the late king's funeral was noted by the Lampman, who was pleased to see these drinking places closed. He says that there are two days in the year on which bars and saloons should be required by law to lock up tight. No bar or saloon, he declares, should be open on Christmas Day or on Good Friday, and he hopes to see the day when there will be a law on the statute book to that effect. The law forces the drinking places to close on Sundays, and those other two days should be added.

In watching the military parade throug the streets last Tuesday, the Lampman noticed quite a difference in the style of marching of the Military College cadets and the men of the 14th Rifle regiment. Of course the cadets perform a kind of clockwork marching that it would be difficult for a volunteer rifle regiment to imitate without a great deal of practice, but the town volunteers did very well. The cadets raise their feet higher than the riflemen and seem to be always marking time. The young redcoats also marched through mud and water without paying any attention to it, and splashed their leggings and trousers as if they despised the dirty roads. The volunteers were more careful of their government clothing, which they had forgotten they were wearing, and one could see the majority of them making eyes at the mud and the pools, and trying to sidestep them if they could. But the Lampman had just as much respect for the careful rifleman as the cadet for, in war, the man who takes care of himself is of more value than the man who does not, providing he does not turn tail and run.
