Kiss In The Dark

By ESTHER VANDEVEER.

George Goddard, starting for the seashore one day in July, felt so buoyant that it seemed he must go up in the air like a balloon. He flung his belongings down into a seat, then walked through the cars, out on to the platform, anywhere, everywhere. He was so happy he couldn't keep still. Then came the cry "all aboard!" He jumped on to the train and rolled out of the station, it seemed, on strewn flowers.

secret, and he could not let it alone. He was impelled to discover what would have been his fate had she been kissed by him as he had intended, knowing him to be the culprit. He made a supposititious case in which a friend of his had done the same thing and asked her had she been the girl kissed what she would have done.

A Happy Outcome

By ANDREW C. EWING.

"There is no truer saying than 'there is compensation in all things.' An example of this came under my observation in the case of one of my subordinates in the army. It began during an engagement. I began during the heat of the fight a stretcher was carried past me and I saw the face of one of my lieutenants, Tom Ashley, pale and with closed eyes. He opened them and gave me the most melancholy look I ever received from any man. A blanket was laid across his body, leaving his legs bare. It was but a momentary passage, after which I became as intent on directing the work of slaughter as before. We assured, however, being on after the won a victory and pushed on to put in the ground a burial squad and our wounded to be taken care of by the surgeons. They cut off a part of Ashley's leg and all of his right arm. I felt an especial pang in the case of Ashley, for, besides being the most promising subaltern in my battalion, I promised him that he was to be married to a very lovely girl. Besides being lovely, she had a fortune in her own right, and I knew that Ashley, who had nothing but his pay, was looking forward to his marriage with high aspirations as to a happy life to follow. In one short fight that lasted barely ten minutes he had been made a cripple and his life was blighted.

The girl seemed to be unaware that there was a young man in the car who was eyeing her longingly. The book she was reading must have been absorbing, for did not pause a moment to look out of the window or anywhere else for that matter—not even in the direction of the admiring Goddard. His happy, excited in him a confidence that would have led him to use any excuse had he been able to invent one, but so long as she kept her eyes glued to the pages before her there was no opening. His Goddard's eyes were so firmly fastened on the girl as her own eyes were fastened on the book, and all this while the special feature to which his glance was directed was that certain lip that only be described by one word—kissable—and this girl's lips were of that kind. Surely it was dangerous for a young girl to be so occupied with a book, sitting just opposite to a pair of kissable lips. Indeed, Goddard, worked upon by his gladness of heart, the beautiful morning, the attractiveness of the girl and those two delicately curved lips, did not wait the moment after it was done filled him with consternation. When the train dashed into a tunnel he made a dash for her, threw his arms around her neck, there was a momentary struggle, and he had kissed her. It was all over within a quarter of a minute, and luckily so, for the tunnel was a very short one; indeed, so short that no lamps had been lighted in the car. When the train shot out into daylight Goddard was looking out of the window with apparent unconcern, though his heart was beating like a kettle drum. It was some time before he dared look at the girl, but when he did she was staring at him. There was another woman who sat in the seat next back of her who was fanning herself vigorously with an appearance of annoyance. Goddard wondered if he had made a mistake. He was not, however, but he was thinking. If he had kissed the wrong person the kiss in the dark had been just as delicious as if he had kissed the right one. Singular, wasn't it?

"Do you tell me," he stammered, "how can you be so sure?"

"Yes. Before I came up here, a friend of mine told me that she would give a young man a note of introduction to me, showing me his photograph. In a tunnel some one kissed me. In the struggle my hand brushed against his scarpin and I seized it. 'He ought to be tarred and feathered.' A burst of laughter from the girl, and the episode was ended.

No Rest for the Wicked.

Montreal Witness.

That there is no rest for the wicked is being illustrated just now in the movements of several base murderers. One of the most notorious who killed a wife in Italy during a drunken orgy, and who escaped to New York where he is now detained, awaiting either extradition or confinement in a lunatic asylum, and there is now accused of murdering and burying his wife, and who is somewhere in hiding, it is thought in the company of a female companion, who was his stenographer. Whether or no, the man is being hunted, disguising himself no doubt, and traveling from place to place under different aliases—unless he is hiding as some think, in London. Whoever he may be, his self-torture must be fearful. Dickens has pictured the sufferings and terrors of murderers in 'Our Mutual Friend' and 'Martin Chuzzlewit.' Crispen will inevitably be caught, unless he commits suicide, and when caught his trial will be speedy, as he will be tried in England, and British justice is swift and fairly sure. His canting position towards mankind is another warning to those who fondly think their errors will not one day conquer them and that their sins will not find them out.

"Rather a neat pin that of yours," he remarked.

"Do you admire it?"

"Well, then, I suppose I'll have to give it to you. It's really a man's pin." She removed it from her person and handed it to him.

"Oh, really, I didn't mean to ask for 'don't value it. It's one I found," Goddard's heart began to beat faster.

"Found? May I ask where?"

"The owner lost it on the train, I fancy the day I came up here." Goddard's heart stood still.

"Did you find it on the floor?"

"No."

"Well, then, where did you find it?"

"Why, to tell the truth, I didn't find it at all. I took it."

Goddard's knees were beginning to give way beneath him.

"Won't you tell me," he stammered, "how can you be so sure?"

BEARS NEAR HARRIE.

Berie Gazette.

While coming into town on the morning of the 9th, Mrs. Thomas Dawson was surprised to see a black bear and cub standing on the side of the road near the home of Alexander Payette, the eighth concession of Veaspa. The bears were within 100 yards of the house. At the sound of voices the larger one reared up and stood watching the rig. "Look at him," said Mrs. Dawson to her "little boy," "look at his hair. It's a real bear." The animal stood blinking gravely at the rig and its occupants for a few moments, while the horse manifested a desire to climb the fence on the opposite side of the road. Presently, with a low grumble, containing nothing but a satisfaction heard only in bears who have dined right royally on strawberries in the woods, Milady Brain dropped on all fours and ambled into the swamp, followed by the sleek cub.
