At the Bijou. To-day is the last day of the third and last part of "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

It is full of the pathos and excitement which characterized the latter part of the great novel, and depicts the cruelties of Legros to the old slave and his final death. It is accompanied to-day by two first class comedies from the American studios of Pathé Freres.

The first is entitled "More Pranks by Rebellious Betty." Some of Betty's doings have been shown before in the Bijou, and "Betty" is becoming a popular favorite. The second comedy is entitled "Pet's Paints the Town" and is another "hummer."

"Betty's Pranks" will be repeated on Saturday, together with a fine drama, "A Slave in Japan" or "Haco's Sacrifice." World this play, the Moving Picture World says, is a powerful Japanese drama, which ranks with the best of the week's productions. It is without a flaw. The actors deserve commendation, and the spectator will wish to see it again.

WERE OUT AT 7 A.M.

To Secure License—'Twas a Little Early.

At seven o'clock on Friday morning people who happened to be passing a certain store might have noticed a young man and his lady friend waiting patiently in front of the store.

Mr. and Mrs. Dan Cupid was responsible. The proprietor of this store is one of the many who issue marriage licenses and the couple were waiting for him to come down to his place of business so that they could get the necessary document.

However, there are very few business men who get down to their stores as early as seven o'clock and as a result the man and his bride-elect had to wait for a while. When he arrived matters were soon fixed up, however, and shortly afterwards the happy knot was tied by a well-known minister.

The couple came from the American side and are now spending their honeymoon taking in the sights in and around Kingston.

A Robinson Crusoe.

Modern times have produced a Robinson Crusoe. An Englishman named Kirklyd emigrated to New Zealand in 1855, and engaged in trading. He sent letters regularly to his family up to 1892. After that he was not heard of until 1895.

He had been shipwrecked on one of the Robinson Islands, and had lived there with a friend, Van Brun, the Friday of the tale, for three years, at the end of which a ship called and he got passage to Sydney. He wrote a cheerful letter to his mother, describing his experiences and making humorous allusions to the creation of their correspondence. Sections of this letter were read recently in a London court, where a motion was heard for leave to swear the death of Kirklyd, in or since 1893.
