

The Globe TORONTO

In the Globe Exclusively. The Globe endeavors to live up to the title, "Canada's National Newspaper," by being the only paper maintaining an editorial representative at Winnipeg, to deal at first hand with conditions in Western Canada; another in Montreal, reporting daily on affairs as they occur at the country's commercial metropolis, and another at Ottawa, dealing with the nation's political matters.

In addition to these The Globe has at present a member of its editorial staff on a tour of the Maritime Provinces, so that the people of Central Canada may know of the progress taking place "down by the sea."

It is only through knowing each other's problems that the people of the different parts of Canada are able to understand and appreciate each other, and The Globe is trying to build up a united and prosperous Canada.

If not how a reader of The Globe, you are missing much valuable information that appears in no other journal.

WHITNEY PARTY TO BLAME. A conservative print calls to mind that the bilingual schools were a legacy of the Ross government. Yes?

The Whitney government has not regarded the good work of the Ross government as sacred in any particular. The Ross government left nothing its successor was obliged to continue unless it was pleased to do so.

As a matter of fact the situation in Essex has materially changed since the Ross government held office. The bilingual schools have not been improved. The French and English in recent years, and since the Whitney government came into power, have organized opposing camps, and, according to the interview of the press men with the leaders of thought, the education department has not been disposing of the difficulty. It must do something now, thanks to Mr. Fallon, the energetic man whom Hon. Mr. Hanna has intimated the government cannot ignore.

And the Ross government was not in office when a deputation visited Toronto from the east and protested against the development of the bilingual schools. The Whitney government turned down that party, or sent its members home without any assurance of a change, only to realize that during the intervening months the rebellious spirit has been gaining in power and intensity.

The Ross government left no legacies. The Whitney government was under no obligations to respect. Every condition of government now existing, five years after the change of administration, is a condition for which the present government is wholly and completely responsible.

NO PLACE FOR POLITICS. The Belleville Ontario gives an experience which is worth something in view of the decision of the Toronto conservatives to run the municipal elections on political lines. Belleville had the political fever bad. It affected both political parties and everything they did was influenced by a political bias.

"Each party," says the Ontario, "had their successes, with the result that their friends were chosen as assessors, and those appointees 'doctored' the assessment rolls so far as they were able, in the interest of their party, having regard to the voters' list. Corruption gradually crept in, and jobs were perpetrated which were condoned by men who would not have done so otherwise than at the behest of party, and the minority were powerless to redress the wrong. Finally the grafters quarreled among themselves, and the exposure which followed led to the virtual extinction of politics in the municipal elections, to the great benefit of Belleville."

Brookville, some years ago, was similarly afflicted with political partisanship. The business of the town was run by the politicians, not in the public, but party's interest, and this experience continued until the people generally rebelled. Then the political leaders came together and agreed to elect a council that would leave politics out of the reckoning in municipal affairs, and the experiment has been eminently and entirely satisfactory. The day may come when there will be a revival of old conditions, but it will be when those who are active in municipal life and have passed away and are no longer the guides in municipal matters.

In Kingston there is some enquiry about next year's council. Is it not possible for the leading men in each ward to assemble in what may be called a direct primary, to agree upon the men who should represent the people in the council. Granted that it is possible for any ambitious man to get a nomination and become a candidate no one can be elected without the concurrence of the electors. A representative ticket should be cordially endorsed by the ratepayers. It is time the reproach were wiped away that the city is suffering in any way, and to any extent, on account of its council.

HERESFORD AN ALARMIST. Lord Heresford has been somewhat over-acted, but he has not been idle and he has not been silent. He has addressed two open letters to the prime minister, but as they have been printed they are readily addressed to the people and are meant to stir them up. The retired admiral has calculated that by 1914 Germany will be a dangerous naval foe, while Italy and Austria will be very powerful as members of the Triple Alliance.

The New York Herald's London correspondent has been getting at the facts, and his exhibit is not at all alarming. He finds that Great Britain, four years hence, will have twenty-five Dreadnoughts, as against twenty-nine of the Triple Alliance. Of pre-Dreadnoughts, Great Britain will have forty not twenty years old, or nearly as many as the Triple Alliance. In armoured cruisers, the mother country in 1914 will have thirty-five, while the Triple Alliance will have twenty. In unarmoured cruisers, for the defence of commerce, Great Britain will have sixty-eight in 1914, and the three other powers, forty-eight. England will, therefore, says the Herald, "possess a strength in unarmoured, as in armoured, cruisers of more than twice that of Germany, Italy and Austria combined."

In regard to destroyers, there will be in Britain, under fifteen years, a total of 124, and the alliance, 144. The slight inferiority in numbers, but not in size, is quite outweighed by the torpedo boats, for in this category Great Britain includes the thirty-six turbine driven coastal destroyers, which surpass many of the foreign destroyers; while in regard to submarines, England has provided for eighty-four, or, if the original Hollands and the A class boats are ruled out as obsolete, sixty-eight, as compared with eight for Germany and seven each for Austria and Italy.

"Much depends upon the provision made next year for battle ships, and in the next two years for cruisers and torpedo craft," says the Herald, "but the above figures can hardly be said to support the contention of Lord Charles Bessford, that in three years the naval defence of the empire will be fraught with danger, whose gravity I believe it to be difficult to exaggerate."

My lord can be called an alarmist. He entered parliament with an ambition to do great things for the navy, and he does not want to disappoint his constituents. The difficulty is to keep up an agitation when all appearances are against him.

A CONVICT'S HYMN

BEARS NAME OF THE MAN IN PENITENTIARY. Proof Inconclusive — Investigators Have Written to Prisoner and Warden and Now Await Their Replies.

A letter from Mrs. Huckle, Rochester, N.Y., the wife of William Huckle, the Kingston convict, who laid claim to the authorship of "Just For Today," has been received by J. Edmund Jones, and it discloses the fact that the copy in her possession, alleged by her husband to be a duplicate of the original, bears the words, "W. G. Huckle, Passaic, N.J.," printed at the bottom of the page.

Mr. Jones was prevented publishing Mrs. Huckle's letter by a promise exacted by her when writing the letter. It appears that the woman has a copy of the hymn printed on slips of paper.

"Have those copies 'Copyrighted by W. G. Huckle in (such a year)' printed on them?" The Toronto News asked Mr. Jones.

"No; they have not," was the reply. "I wrote to Huckle at the penitentiary and also to the warden, asking him to permit the convict's reply to be forwarded from the prison without hindrance, and also inviting him to assist the chain to, in any reasonable way," said Mr. Jones. "I have had no reply from either."

"Upon the only copy of 'Lord, For Tomorrow and Its Needs,' that Mrs. Huckle has, 'W. G. Huckle, Passaic, N.J.,' is printed at the foot," said Mr. Jones. "This, no doubt, is the copy which Huckle says was printed in 1887. But this was seven years after it appeared in the English Messenger of the Sacred Heart, a copy of which is in the British museum dated January, 1880, the poem appearing on page 38. In Julian's dictionary of Hymnology it is stated that the authoress claims she wrote it in 1877, though it was not published till 1880, so that it is possible that Huckle obtained the words in some way and used them in 1878, as he claims."

"Do the church authorities think that Huckle possibly plagiarized the whole poem?" Mr. Jones was asked.

"Whatever they think, the authorities will make no pronouncement of opinion till the whole thing has been sifted. I merely pointed out the possibility; it is a possibility only."

Dr. Griffith Thomas, who has recently joined the staff at Wycliffe College, Toronto, remembers Archdeacon Canon Basil Wilberforce, son of Bishop Samuel Wilberforce, repeating the hymn at temperance meetings about 1885. Canon Wilberforce, however, did not claim it as his own, or as written by his father or brother.

"It was quite a new hymn at that time. Archdeacon Wilberforce is still alive and has been written to."

"In the Sunday School Hymnary, published in London, in 1906, the hymn is attributed to E. R. Wilberforce, about 1870. This is the late Bishop of Chichester, who, however, never seems to have claimed the hymn. The musical setting in the Sunday School Hymnary is by 'Horatio R. Palmer, about 1875.' Dr. Palmer died a few years ago. His widow is still alive, and lives in Yonkers, N.Y."

"A letter has been written to her inquiring whether she has any evidence that the hymn was in existence before 1880."

"Convict Huckle's claim that he wrote this hymn, which by the best authorities is attributed to the Liverpool man who copyrighted it, has at last served to draw the attention of Canadians to this remarkably beautiful hymn, which has not heretofore been in standard Anglican collections and has served also to show the bond that hymns are to all Christians of all denominations. It is No. 676 in the Book of Common Prayer."

"Dr. Hubert Carlton, the head of St. Andrew's Brotherhood in America, makes much use of this hymn."

The chase after the truth so far has included letters of inquiry sent to Huckle, Mrs. Huckle, the warden of Kingston Penitentiary, and Mrs. Palmer, Yonkers, N.Y., wife of the late Dr. Horatio R. Palmer, whose tune, composed in about 1875, was set to the words as they appeared in the Sunday School Hymnary of 1905. From the present condition of the question, it is gathered that the authorship of the hymn is not finally settled. There can be no doubt that the church authorities would have liked Huckle, if he had any substantiation for his claims, to forward them immediately after the receipt of the inquiry. Delay does not create confidence. In the absence of any word from Kingston it is felt there is a possibility that the convict is communicating with some quarter from which he might receive support.

A WHITE DEER SHOT

BY A CANTON, N.Y., MAN ON THE GRANSHUE. Unquestionable From Any Standpoint Has Been

Freak Buck Also Has Peculiarly Shaped Head—It is Quite a Curiosity.

Canton, N.Y., Oct. 20.—"Arve" Eastman, a well-known guide and hunter, brought in a curiosity, yesterday, in the shape of a pure white deer.

Mr. Eastman, Thomas Cotter and Rufus Allen, all of Canton, were hunting on the Granshue, when Mr. Eastman shot the animal.

It is a buck, apparently about a year old, and has the appearance of an ordinary deer of that age, excepting its color, which is pure white, and the shape of the head, the forehead being somewhat more prominent than is common.

White spotted deer are occasionally shot here, a pure white deer is a curiosity, and no one seems to have ever seen one before. Mr. Eastman shipped the hide, with head and hoofs, to Saranac, where it will be mounted.
