THE SOUTH'S CONFEDERACY. A Look Back Fifty Years After Its Formation.

Fifty years ago to-day the Constituent Convention of the Confederate Montgomery, Ala. Delegates representing six southern states in proportion to their electoral votes met on February 4th, 1861. They adopted February 8th, a temporary constitution. February 9th, voting by states,

The eminent dele gates approached the breach with be coming gravity. They were honorthe able men, most of them deeply religi ous, who believed themselves in the right. Not for one moment did they ary. They believed that they upheld Many constitutional students still hold the southern view of the right of secession under the constitution of the United States. That belief may have prompted Representative Bart-lett, of Georgia, last Wednesday to resent in the House General Keifer's use of the word "rebellion." To defend one's constitutional rights as one sees them is not subjectively a rebellious act. Even the term "civil war" is in that view inaccurate, though less objectionable, As defined in the South it was "the war between the states."

For a schism based avowedly upon constitutional grounds the Confederacy as a government was little changed from its northern model.
