Mr. Sifton points out that since 897 the preference was responsible for a growth of Britain's business which is roughly estimated at 320 per cent. In ten years the increase has been some fifty millions, but in the same period the United States has increased her trade with us to the extent of one bundred and twenty-five millions. Canada's attachment to Britain is to be indicated by the increase of trade with the mother country and an increase of trade with the United States means a gradual weakening of that attachment, surely results would have been apparent by this time both departments. We have undoubtedly strengthened our ties with Britain since 1897 although we have increased our trade with the United States a much greater extent than with the old land. Such analysis seems to bear out the contention that our lovalty is not to be measured by trade figures. Also that we have not fallen in love with the man from whom we buy most of our goods.
