VECKWEAR FADS of MIDSUMMERS

The fichu and the jabot continue to dominate the neckwear situation in the shops. Table after table is piled with fluffy whiteness and amazing bargains are to be picked up now in graceful fichus and the one-sided coat frills which are so smart. This one sided effect in jabots has reached extravagant lengths: Some of the frills are so wide at the top that they have to be pinned or booked at the shoulder to keep them in place, though at the waistline the width is tapering and narrow. The frill flutters out from one side of the coat and covers the other front almost to the armhole, a tiny hook being sewed in the upper corper and a corresponding loop in the shoulder of the coat.

The very newest thing-according to Paris notions, is the unfrilled frill-so to speak. Instead of being gathered or pleated the lace which forms the edge of this jabor is mitred so that the fichu forms a square corner which lies obliquely on the coat front. That is, the corner of the lace lies diagonally along the edge of the front closing. There are variations of this new straight jabot, which is made usually of very wide filet or Calais lace insertion, the pattern of the lace showing up in beautiful effect against the dark material of a wool, satin or mohair
