people you can get on to a given area of land the greater the value of the land—which to the man desiring a comfortable, quiet life is an illusion.

So we persist in packing our towns and cities with people often at the expense of the rural parts. We build up big communities on small areas of high-priced land. The influence of the city community reaches cut over the community reaches out over the oining farm lands which go up in adjoining farm lands which go up in price for three reasons: sympathy with the value of town property, the rapid extension of the suburban subdivision, and the practical value of good land adjacent to a city for the market and fruit garden business.

Thus begins a backward movement to the land. City dwellers burdened with high rents and crowded quarters begin to acquire suburban and even country residences where the time and the money required for transportation do fall a margin below the cost of rent and of other items of living in the city.

The whole thing becomes a mathematical problem, whereby a man figures an hour each way on a suburban and street railway car as worth so much a week or a month to the extra cost of living in the town and allowing so much for the increase of comfort by living in the country.

One of the results of this backward movement is that the city man with a plot of land near his house learns to go gardening. He finds that with an hour a day in the summer he car tend his garden more or less, do a little casual hiring and produce vegetables and small fruits enough to supply his own tables with perhaps an occasional sale to friends of his in

A Rugby Story.

Mr. Maitland McCarthy, ex-M.P., of Calgary, was formerly a great rugby football player.

A game was being played some years ago at Kingston between Queen's University and the Hamilton Tigers. The spectators kept crowding on the sidelines, and as the game was a hard one, McCarthy, who was the Tiger captain, lost his temper. He singled out a grey-bearded, elderly gentleman, and shouted at him: "Get out of here, whiskers; you ought to know better than crowd on the field like this!" Or words to that effect.

Check Infant Mortality.

The chief medical inspector of Toonto, Dr. Struthers, is inaugurating a system whereby he hopes to check the greate rate of infant mortality in Toronto. Dr. Struthers states that nurses are at present visiting homes, and taking children to the hospitals and dispensaries that are attacked with disease. His plan is to continue this throughout the summer months, and combined with the new classes, it ought to prevent a great number of the infant deaths in Toronto.
