I Love You

By Lucella Mabelle Sidney.

Ellerton Fuller lay stretched out in his easy chair. The cigar between his lips had gone out. Across his knees the evening paper lay unread, while he stared gloomily into the fire.

That morning he had received notice from the firm that he was to take charge of the branch house in San Francisco for a year, and that he would have to start west the next week.

He had been dismayed, for it meant separation from the girl to whom he had been devoted for a long time.

In the evening, as soon as possible after a hurried dinner, he had called upon her, and, finding her alone, had told her of his love, and had asked her to marry him.

She had refused him. When pressed for her reason she had said that although she liked him, she did not care for him enough to marry him.

"But you must like me a little, or you would never have let me see so much of you in the past year."

The anxious question in his voice hurt her.

"It is just because I like you so much, and respect you so highly, that I don't want to do you the injustice of marrying you without loving you. Every man has the right to be loved with the mind, body and spirit of the woman who marries him. You would be defrauded of that right."

"I am willing to run the risk." "You may be now, but later on we would both feel the lack of the complete love, and you would be restless and unhappy."

"If I were here and could have this time with you I might make you love me."

"That is something beyond our knowledge." "Will you let me write to you while I am away? That will help you to remember me. All of your other friends will be here with you, and one of them might win you."

She hesitated, then said, "No, I don't care to correspond with any man."

"Then I am to go away and leave you for a whole year without hearing from you?"

"It would be far better to do that than to raise false hopes." "Make me just one promise before I go. If you are free when I get back, may I have another chance to try and win you?"

"Why—yes, you may if you still feel the same then." "All the way home he was haunted by the question, "How can I teach her to love me when there are to be so many thousand miles between us? A year is an eternity, and some other fellow will win her."

"There is nothing to do," he thought, "but to win her myself. A man can not force himself on a woman who does not want him, and even letters are denied to me."

The whole world was wrong; the woman he loved refused him; he must leave his friends and go among strangers for a year. Even his cigar failed to bring comfort to him.

INSIST ON GETTING

was across the continent, and yet twice each day came a message of his love and loyalty to her.

A man who could be so faithful deserved to be loved, and she began to worry because she could not love him.

This led to her thinking of him more and more. At last not an hour of the day passed without her thoughts suggesting him to her, and he, life seemed full of him, of his letters, and of his doings.

One morning there was no letter. She looked again and again through her mail with the same result. Thinking that perhaps the maid had been mistaken, she searched through all the other letters on the table.

Nothing! Perhaps it had been delayed and would come by the next post, but she was restless and broke an engagement to stay at home all the morning and listen for the post-man's whistle.

"When the afternoon brought neither letter nor violets, she was filled with anxiety. She forced herself to go through dinner, but told her mother that she would not go to the opera, as she had a severe headache."

"Your cheeks are unusually red, my dear," said her mother. "You must have taken cold, for you are feverish. You had better take a hot lemonade and go to sleep early."

"I could not sleep. I will lie down and read in the library." "About half past nine the bell rang, and the maid brought up a card."

"I told him you were ill, ma'am, and might not be able to see him," she said.

Dorothy glanced at the card. It was familiar enough. "Mr. Ellerton Fuller." The blood rushed over her face.

"Say that I will be down at once." She held on to the banister for support, and slowly stepped down from stair to stair, for she trembled so that she feared she would fall.

"Good evening," she said, putting out a hand which shook in spite of her efforts for self control.

Ellerton Fuller took her hand in both of his and looked her over eagerly, studying each feature again and again.

"I have been counting the very minutes until this hour for the last six months. Have I won or lost in my struggle to make you love me?"

"My love for you has grown from day to day, until it did not seem as if I could wait to get across the continent." Dorothy, tell me, do you, can you love me as I do you?"
