And back of that determination, all three assert, is the refusal of Britain at the last Hague conference to agree with the United States and Germany that private sea-born commerce should not be subject to capture and confiscation in time of war. Mr. Keir Hardie stated that the fact of Britain's success in securing the defeat of the reform proposed at the last Hague conference has "driven home to the commer cial classes of Germany the convic tion that without a navy their whole overseas trade would be at the mercy of the British navy if the
