

CURED OF THIS HORRIBLE DISEASE

Edmonton Girl saved By "Fruit-a-tives"

EDMONTON, ALTA., Nov. 20th 1911.
"I had been a sufferer from babyhood with that terrible complaint, Constipation.
I have been treated by physicians and have taken every medicine that I heard of, but without the slightest benefit. I concluded that there was no cure for this horrible disease.
Finally, I read of "Fruit-a-tives" and decided to try them, and the effect was marvellous.
The first box gave me great relief, and after I used a few boxes, I found that I was entirely well.
"Fruit-a-tives" is the only medicine that ever did me any good for Chronic Constipation and I want to say to all who suffer as I did—Try "Fruit-a-tives"—why suffer any longer when there is a perfect cure in this great fruit medicine.
(Miss) E. A. GOODALL.
"Fruit-a-tives" is the only remedy in the world made of fruit and the only one that will completely and absolutely cure Constipation.
50c a box, 6 for $2.50, trial size, 25c. At all dealers or sent on receipt of price by Fruit-a-tives Limited, Ottawa.

WAS KING OF JUNGLE

ENGLISH SAILOR HAD AMAZING ADVENTURE IN AFRICA.

Engineer on a Freight Liner Took a Holiday to Shoot Big Game on the East Coast and Was Captured by Blacks—Fought the Native Ruler and Got Thrown by a Strange Accident—Wives Too Many for Him.
Stranger adventure than that which befel an Englishman on the East Coast of Africa is seldom met with outside the realms of fiction.
While hunting in the jungle he fell asleep, was brought before a tribal king, fought that potentate, became ruler because of the attachment for his wife, and in a matter of hours the duration, for, according to his own account, the "sixteen wives" practically henpecked him off the throne. His escape also makes thrilling reading.
The story of Mr. Hugh Edward Gilhespie is told by The Manchester Dispatch. Mr. Gilhespie is a native of Newcastle, who, after serving an apprenticeship at Hawthorns, entered the service of the Prince Line nine years ago, and at the time of his adventure was, as he still is, second engineer on the Royal Prince, and had long nourished the desire to have some big game shooting.
At Mombasa he obtained the necessary leave, and, with a guide, set out for the jungle. Coming on the trail of elephants, they followed it up until the tracks became stronger. The guide suggested their separating so as to come on the game from two sides, and this was done.
Gilhespie followed the trail until he felt he was either lost or in danger of it, whereupon he tried to get his guide by shouting, but no answer came. Tired, weak and hungry, he sat down to contemplate the situation, but fell asleep.
He was roughly awakened by a number of natives, who took possession of his rifle and revolver, and marched him to their village and before their king.
The natives kow-towed to their monarch, and tried to make the Englishman do the same. This he refused to do, and, as they persisted, he lost his temper and struck out with such effect that three of the natives were on the ground.
The king, evidently incensed at the treatment of his men, made a blind rush for Gilhespie. As he came on with his head down, like a mad bull, Gilhespie stepped aside and delivered a telling blow which laid him on the ground. No fewer than six times did the savage make similar bull-like rushes, each time to receive exactly the same felling blows.
Then he tried close quarters, and for fully half an hour the two fought, wriggled, and wriggled on the ground, each getting a blow in when the opportunity offered. At last Gilhespie delivered the "knock-out," and while he was recovering his breath and generally pulling himself together the strangest thing happened.
A little monkey, which had been sitting at the side of the throne, ran to Gilhespie and climbed on his shoulder.
The natives prostrated themselves face down on the ground and gave utterance to weird cries.
The rest of the story is best told in Mr. Gilhespie's own words:
"An old chap, with a big staff, the head carved in the shape of a strange bird, came towards me and kow-towed. Then he pointed to me and motioned towards the throne. I then began to realize that I was chosen to be their king. I walked towards the throne, and the natives chanted a weird heathen song. When I sat down, with the monkey still on my shoulder, they cheered so loud that they brought the king back to consciousness. He took a good look at me upon the throne, and fled madly into the forest.
"I was duly made king by the chief medicine man. I soon learned how it all came about. The monkey, it seems, was a sort of personification of the god which lived in the depth of the jungle, whom the natives worshipped, and when it jumped on my shoulder they accepted that as a sign that they had chosen me as their ruler."
"But my troubles began very soon. All because of the royal wives, of whom there were sixteen. The man who finds himself henpecked by one wife is to be pitied, but think of a man henpecked by sixteen! That was my case.
"These wives wore strings of lions' teeth as necklaces, and they were always wanting more. I sent the hunters of the tribe out to get more, but they were unsuccessful, and my wives fidgeted and scolded day and night in consequence. After I had been king of the tribe for about three weeks I concluded that the job was not to my liking, and I decided to escape.
"One night, when the sixteen females had passed me until my head was swimming, I tip-toed out of the hut, stole through the village, and made for the woods. I had not gone far when I heard a noise which made my blood cold. I thought my sixteen wives were on my trail, but when I looked back I saw it was only the sacred monkey. That monkey was my salvation, for it took me in the right direction. About sunset next day, when I was famishing for food and water, I came on the camp of an English hunting party.
"Well, to make a long story short, the Englishmen guided me back to Mombasa, and when I went on board the Royal Prince the crew thought I was a ghost.
"It is a strange story, but it is true. And if Sophia—that is the monkey's name now—could only speak, she would confirm every word of it. I did not inherit royalty. I had it thrust upon me, and I have had sufficient of it."

KNIGHTHOOD ERRORS.

Some Funny Mistakes Have Occurred Over Honor-Giving.
The apportioning of honors to celebrate such occasions as the King's birthday is not an easy one for the Prime Minister and others concerned. Somebody is sure to be aggrieved; somebody sure to be overlooked. And many amusing stories are related about the newly-made knights in these auspicious occasions. For the new knight, in his flurry and agitation, is so likely to do strange or unsuitable things in the presence of royalty that the amusing tales about him have become legion to the general public.
Of the really true ones, however, the following are some of the best. Who can forget the contretemps which occurred when Queen Victoria was about to knight a certain prominent citizen of Leamington, a man whose name remains unremembered in the town, as one of its most benefactors? But, just as the Queen was about to knight him, so agitated did he become that he forgot what ought to be done. He rose too soon, and left the room, turning his back on her all the way, and not actually knowing, but that the ceremony was over! Needless to say he was never really knighted at all, and right to the day of his death Leamington felt much aggrieved at the mishap.
Then there was that occasion when Mr. John Thomas, of Buckingham, was included in the birthday honors. Mr. Thomas, who is a well-known paper manufacturer, was a knight. But the similarity of his name (together with no mention of his name) to that of the famous musician who was so long the royal harpist, led many to mistake the knight for the musician. Mr. John Thomas, the fine Welsh harper, received more than 1,000 congratulatory messages from friends far and near who took him to be the lucky and worthy recipient of the King's favor.
It falls to the lot of few men to be twice knighted! In fact only once within our own generation has such a thing happened. Some score years or so ago the then Lord Herschel went to Windsor to be invested by Queen Victoria with the Grand Cross of the Bath. On those occasions the Queen was very rapid in her movements, and his lordship, having sunk on one knee to be invested, before anyone present had grasped the error and could interfere, Her Majesty touched him with the sword and gave him the honor of knighthood! She herself overlooked the fact that she had actually knighted him only two years previously.
The celebrated war correspondent of The London Times, Mr. W. H. Russell, had a physical frame nearly as small as his mind was large. Hence his familiar friends commonly called him "Little Billee"; and one of the best and most valued of such friends was his late Majesty, King Edward.
Very touching and delightful was the scene when Sir William Howard Russell came forward to be knighted by the sovereign whom he had known so long and served so faithfully, and whose steps as a young man he had guided over the battlefields of the Crimean War when the then Prince of Wales visited that interesting spot.
The famous journalist's small frame and physical infirmities would have made it a trial for him to kneel down before the King. The kind heart of Edward VII. grasped his at once, as the knight in embryo came forward.
"Don't trouble to kneel, Billie! Sloop!" whispered the monarch with a sweet smile.
Russell's eyes filled at this kindly thought of his King and friend. He "slooped," the sovereign touched his shoulder very lightly, and then said just a word in congratulation, as the new knight will feel, affectionately kissed the royal hand.
Few Premiers have ever been more cynical than was Disraeli, afterwards Lord Beaconsfield. The Right Hon. George Wyndham, who knew him well, relates how on one occasion Disraeli was much pleased by a well-known politician to bestow a knighthood on a friend who much desired it.
"Tell your friend that the source of honor in this country is a fountain, not a pump!" was Beaconsfield's laconic answer.

Wrestling Giants of the Lake District of Rural England.
If you would see the finest of our old English sports at its best, says London Tri-Bits, you should pay a visit to the Lakes when Grasmore is holding her celebrated sports at the foot of her rugged fells; for there you will see such wrestling as is worth traveling a hundred miles to see. It is there that many an English county, from Lancashire to Cornwall, has its mighty wrestlers, men of iron muscle and portentous girth of chest; but few of them compare in strength and skill with the "lads" of Cumberland and Westmorland.
And it is but fitting that it should be so, for these Lake counties have been the true home of this fine old sport ever since our Viking forefathers introduced it a thousand years ago. This stern land of fell and dale is the nursery of men with strong thighs and long backs, and these thighs and backs are made for wrestling.
In Edward VI.'s time the giant Herd went from Westmorland to wrestle before the King, and won by a narrow margin and home in his native vale. The days of the "Cock" Lad of Kentmore still echo in the Troutbeck Valley. But it was not until the middle of the eighteenth century that wrestling became a fashion as well as a passion. Old and young took part in it. The champion went to church wearing his champion's belt on the Sunday after his victory, and, by way of challenge, displayed his decoration at a neighboring church on the Sunday following.
In these old days the sport had many centers to which its devotees flocked. Stone, near Greystock, was the great meeting-place for the Cumbrians Melmerby and Langwathby drew their thousands in the east. Then, a century ago, came the famous Swift's ring at Carlisle, Arclodon, and Egremont; and, not content with such Olympics as these for the winning of laurels, there was no barn in the two counties in which the fell-shepherds and farmers did not practice the arts of hype and buttock every week of the year.
For the love of wrestling is in the blood of every true son of the dales. Any schoolboy in Lakeland will tell you with proud face and flashing eyes, that William Richardson, of Caldbeck (who was dubbed "Belted Will" by "Christopher North"), won no fewer than 240 championship belts. And was what Charles Dickens among his most enthusiastic applauders when Longmire the Leviathan captured the hundred and seventy-fifth of his trophies?
Prof. John Wilson, known to fame as "Christopher North," the friend of Keats, Coleridge, and Wordsworth, still had a hand to contend with in Lakeland, for it was he, more than any other man, who made Grasmore the Mecca of lovers of wrestling. This "six-foot Apollo," whose tread seemed almost to shake the earth, was not content to offer prizes for wrestling and to induce all the local gentry to patronize the sport; he would invariably try a fall himself with the champion of the day, and as often as not come off victor.

FATHER OF COMMONS.
Thomps Burt Has Been Thirty-Eight Years in British House.
Mr. Thomas Burt, who is the "father" of the British House of Commons, and who has represented Morpeth for thirty-eight years, is about to meet with opposition from his own camp in his old age. Mr. Burt's views are not sufficiently advanced to meet the approval of some of the more ardent spirits of the labor section, and the local branch of the Independent Labor party is proposing to run a candidate in opposition to him at the next election.
Mr. Burt has had a very remarkable career, and has carved out for himself a unique position. There is no man in the House of Commons more highly respected, and his winning personality has gained him hosts of friends. He started his life in the pit, and throughout his career he has been the miners' advocate. Except for a couple of years' attendance at the village school Mr. Burt is entirely self-educated. When twenty-two years old he was working twelve hours a day as a trapper boy. Then he was promoted to the position of donkey-driver at the handsome salary of one shilling a day.
In those days strikes were very common, though the workers were quite unorganized. Thomas Burt was a strong advocate of trade unionism, and though his attitude made him unpopular with employers he gained the confidence of his fellow-workmen. In 1855 they elected him secretary of the Northumberland Miners' Mutual Provident Association, and nine years later sent him to Parliament as their representative.
He was the first miner to enter Parliament, and in connection with his election good news is told. Mr. Burt was opposed by Major Dunbar, and the latter was accorded a most friendly reception. He was thus lured by the expressions of friendliness to seeking a vote of confidence as a Conservative candidate at one of the meetings. The vote received no support, which caused the major to comment: "What do you mean? You come in crowds to my meetings; you do not interrupt me; you cheer my speeches; and then you vote against me to a man?"
"Why, yes," was the reply, "we like you well enough, but we're glad to vote for Tommy Burt!"
Mr. Burt is a Privy Councillor, and has been honored with the Freedom of Newcastle-on-Tyne as well as that of Morpeth.

A Remarkable Curiosity.
There is in Connaught, Ireland, a remarkable curiosity, which gives an example of official oversight. When the great famine of 1874 was upon the land the Government of the day conceived the idea of opening a line of navigation from Galway to Ballina by way of Lough Corrib and Lough Mask, so as to avoid the dangers of the west coast. From Cong a canal was actually made to Lough Mask as part of the general scheme. The work gave a great deal of employment and so far the canal served its purpose. But when it was completed it was found the canal would not hold water. The fact that the rock of the district is of a very porous character had been overlooked.
Bright Pupils.
Here are some answers culled from British school examination papers:
"The Satic law is that you must take everything with a grain of salt."
"Julius Caesar was renowned for his great strength. He threw a bridge across the Rhine."
"The Zoidia is the zoo of the sky, where lions, goats and other animals go after they are dead."
"The Pharisees were people who like to show off their goodness by praying in synagogues."
"An abstract noun is something you cannot see when you are looking at it."
"Algebraical symbols are used when you do not know what you are talking about."
—Westminster Gazette.

Another Kind.
The late Justice Wills once made a rather cutting remark to a barrister. The barrister was, in the judge's opinion, simply wasting the time of the court, and in the course of a long-winded speech he dwelt at quite unnecessary length on the appearance of certain bags connected with the case.
"They might," he went on pompously—"they might have been full bags, or they might have been half filled bags, or they might even have been empty bags, or—"
"Or perhaps, dryly interposed the judge, "they might have been wind-bags."

"Paradise Lost."
Milton's "Paradise Lost" was commenced between 1639 and 1642 and completed about the time of the great fire of London in September, 1666. Its author composed it in passages of from ten to twenty lines at a time and then dictated them to an amanuensis, usually some attached friend. It was first published in 1667 by Samuel Simmons, and a second edition appeared in 1674. For these two editions Milton received $50 and his widow $40 more.

Boys in Parliament.
It is contended that the British House of Commons is the most youthful representative legislative body in the world, since it includes not only all social grades, from the miner and the artisan to the scions of ducal houses, but numbers among its members men of all ages, from the youth in his 20's to the veterans of 80 years.
So long ago as the year 1613 there were 40 legislators in the Commons who had not attained their 20th year, and incredible as it may seem, certain of them were only 16 years of age.
Edmund Waller, the poet and counterpart of Stuart days, was a school boy of 16 when he qualified as a member of Parliament. He was, as Clarendon says, "nursed in Parliament," and probably was the only man that ever lived who could look back two-thirds of a century to his debut as a legislator.
New Zealand's Frozen Meat.
While the prosperity of New Zealand is ascribed by some people to its socialistic institutions, economists declare that the cause is due to the frozen meat industry. Since 1858 shipments of frozen meat to England have increased enormously and they now are valued at more than $15,000,000 per annum.
There are six companies engaged in this trade and they pay 6 to 15 per cent on their capital, invested. The meat, once frozen in New Zealand, is kept frozen throughout its long journey and until it is ready for sale to the consumer. The refrigerating process has increased the wealth of New Zealand by $50,000,000.

Burned at the Stake.
As late as the end of the eighteenth century counterfeiters were publicly burned at the stake in London. On March 18, 1789, Christiania Murphy was executed at Newgate tower, London, for the crime of "coining." She was bound to the stake seated on a stool, the main tie being a cord around the neck. The funeral pyre was then lighted by the executioner and his deputies, one of the latter of whom finally jerked the stool from under the wretched creature, allowing the weight to fall on her neck. Within forty-eight minutes the body was entirely reduced to ash and buried in a hole on the spot where the execution took place.
