Mona Lisa. By Charlotte Carson Talcott. Bloomfield.

Mona Lisa—famed, adored! The face a great soul stirred. And so, wherever Art is known Thy fated name is heard. Thy rapt, the penetrating eye, With mystic meaning wise, Reveals the depth of Love untold That's born of Paradise.

Pressed lips, that hold the inmost thought From one whom thou would'st love, Smile with content, eye, gentle scorn, Deep passion—all inwove, Thy siren voice I seem to hear, Like music from the night. Sweeter than murmurous sounds of streams, Soul-swaying in its might.

We Have the Very Best. Oysters, Chestnuts, Cranberries, Florida Oranges, Grape Fruit, Pineapples, Malaga Grapes, Russet Apples, Bananas, etc., at Carnovsky's.

The Asbury Methodist church, Watertown, N.Y., the $100,000 edifice which has been in course of construction for nearly two years, will be dedicated during the week of Feb. 5th.

PUNS OF FAMOUS MEN.

English Writers Who Used This Form of Wit. New York Tribune.

The pun, as a form of wit holds no very high position in the estimation of most writers and humorists. Nevertheless many outstanding figures in the history of English literature have not refrained, on occasions from turning punster.

Theodore Hook once bragged that he could make a pun on any subject. "Well, then," said a friend "make one on the king."

"The king is no subject" replied the wit.

To a similar boast Douglas Jerrold, a fellow clubman replied: "Can you make a pun on the signs of the Zodiac?"

"By Gemini! I can sir!" was the double-barreled retort.

Dr. John Watson, better known as Ian MacLaren, was another wag who boasted of his facility for punning.

At a dinner in London, where many literary men were present, he asserted that he could make a good pun as anyone in the room. The challenge was accepted. Thereupon Dr. Watson assumed a serious mien and appeared lost in thought.

"Come now, Watson," exclaimed Hall Caine. "We are waiting."

"Quite so," flashed back the other, "but please don't be in such a hurry, Caine."
