LITTLE NELL

"God bless daddy, mamma, George, Elsie, and the wee dog above the bed," and then there was a long pause. The little boy raised his head from his mother's lap and showed a very red face.

"What wee dog, John?" asked mamma Fulton.

John looked round, but Elsie and George had left the kitchen. He tried to speak, but instead of words came tears.

Mamma Fulton took his hand, raised him up, and led him to the room. A moment later she called, "Daddy, come here a minute."

Daddy Fulton laid down his paper, and walked to the room.

"Just see what's under the bed," said Mamma Fulton.

He went down on his knees and looked under the boy's bed. There was a little black heap near the wall. He crawled under the bed, took hold of it, and dragged it into the light.

"Who brought this here?" he asked, somewhat sternly.

All the children were now crying. George was the eldest—he was a plump little fellow of nine—and the others looked to him to reply.

"Oh, dad, it was 'lyin' down in the close; it couldn't walk, and some big boys were tormentin' it, so we were gien it a wee rest—just till the mornin'."

Daddy looked closely at the little ferrier, with its coat and legs all splashed with mud, and saw that one of its paws was stained with blood. He lifted up the dog tenderly, carried it to the kitchen, and placed it on the rug before the fire. He gave it some food, and then it lay down as if it could keep awake no longer.

The children were satisfied, and went to bed happy.

The little dog was very lame, and was allowed to stay with the Fultons until it could run about with comfort.

Nell, as the children named her, was given a good bath in the wash-house. She lost her torn and tattered look, and became trim and smart. She and the children were soon fast friends. They loved to play round the fire and play on the hearthrug.

As the days passed Daddy and Mamma Fulton began to look seriously at Nell. They were very poor, and had no money for a dog license, so they had to make up their minds to send Nell away. They often talked of the matter when the children were asleep without being able to decide what to do.

"I hate the disappoint the weans," said Daddy Fulton, "but Nell must go."

It was Saturday afternoon. The dinner dishes had been washed and put away. George, Elsie, and John were given their weekly halfpennies and sent out to spend them. Nell was not allowed to go with them, so she curled herself up in front of the fire and blinked at the dancing flames.

Daddy Fulton put on his cap, took her in his arms, and went out. When he reached the closemouth he looked about to see if the children were near. Ah, there they were on the other side of the street looking at the good things in the window of a sweet-shop, and wanting to buy the lot.

He hurried down the street and was soon out of sight. He walked on for a long time till he reached Glasgow Cross. Then he put Nell down near King William's Statue and ran away. Nell did not waste a minute, but followed him at once. Daddy Fulton tried to slip into the underground railway station, but Nell was too sharp for him. She soon caught up to him and rested on his side.

The Cross was very busy. Men and women were standing about or jostling each other on the pavement. Cabs, vans, lorries, and barrows were passing from every corner.

Daddy Fulton tried to get away from Nell in the crowd, but she kept too close to him. At last, feeling like one who has done something very wrong, he jumped on a car going east and hurried upstairs. When he reached the top he turned and saw poor Nell standing at the Cross and gazing after the car as if she did not know what to do. She was such a forlorn-looking little creature that Daddy Fulton felt very miserable at having deserted her.

He was very quiet that afternoon as he sat in his wooden armchair with his feet on the fender and a newspaper in his hand.

Mamma Fulton had gone out to buy the Sunday dinner.

Suddenly there was a great noise on the stairs. He rose and opened the door. In rushed the three children—Elsie crying, John spluttering with excitement, and George carrying Nell—poor, dirty, battered Nell.

"What's this?" asked Daddy Fulton.

"Oh, daddy," began Elsie—"Elsie was nearly run over," cried John.

"Ay, but Nell saved her," said George, with a smile and a pat for the little dog.

"When the children were quieted, the whole story was told.

Elsie had been crossing the street, careless of her horse and van coming rapidly towards her. She would have been knocked down had not a little dog given a bark and jumped at the horse's nose. The horse had turned aside and Elsie was saved, but Nell's forelegs were badly crushed.

Brave little Nell! Her glistening eyes showed the terrible pain she was suffering.

It took a long time to put her right again. At first Daddy Fulton had little hope of being able to save her. But she was saved, although she was never as sound in her limbs as before the accident. However, though lame and not so beautiful, to Elsie, George, and John she was the dearest little doggie in all Glasgow.

As a decoration for her bravery, a nice blue ribbon was tied around her neck, and this she wore to the end of her days.

There was now no thought of putting her away. A license was bought, and Nell became one of the family.

The man who really knows a woman doesn't pretend to understand her.

Henry E. Sherlock, who died at Canton, Ohio, on the 26th of March, was in Kingston five weeks ago. He purchased the Gessner summer home on Milton Island, and expected to summer there.

WEST GROWING FAST

Joseph Martin, M.P., Found Unhealthy Realty Boom.

London, April 9.—Joseph Martin, M.P. for St. Pancras, London, on being interviewed on his return from a tour of Canada extending over several months, expressed the opinion that some of the cities of the west had grown too fast, while the immense expenditure in building two transcontinental railways had largely been the cause of the unhealthy real estate boom. Nevertheless, with Canada's substantial natural resources, there was every reason to expect that the country would regain its good condition, and Mr. Martin believes that the British investor would be taking a safe course in lending money in the domain.

MILLIONS FOR THE WEST

Opening of Panama Canal Will Enrich Farmers

London, April 9.—Dr. Voorman, of British Columbia, speaking at the Royal Colonial Institute, estimated that the Panama-canal would put the Alberta farmer seven cents a bushel nearer Liverpool in summer and fifteen cents a bushel in winter. He stated that if the canal had been already opened the Western Canadian farmers would have made a clean gain of four million dollars on the crop of 1912, and it was easy to see a free gift from the canal to Alberta, and Saskatchewan of fifty million pounds sterling in the saving on freight rates.
